CHAPTER I.

A SOLDIER OF FORTUNE.

I lounged down the "Rialto," the rendezvous of actors, with what I hoped was all dignity and a good deal of the beauty of a young Apollo. My costume was faultless, and I was aware that I was the object of more than one admiring glance. So far as outward show went, I might have been a mogul millionaire—one of the new brood, young in years, who husband their resources after the manner of the miser, or scatter them according to the way of the spendthrift, as instinct may happen to order.

But Mr. Algernon Mount Morris, as of late I had chosen to be called, was not only a bird of fine feathers, but he was also a bird with a hunger. In spite of his athletic appearance and fashion-plate style, there was a tremendous emptiness in his internal organism which indicated a lack of breakfast and an unarrived dinner. To speak frankly, my finances were at an ebb the lowest they had ever marked, and I was meditating a visit to an "uncle" if in some direction I did not catch sight of a rift in the clouds of adversity. Such a call I had never yet been forced to make in all the ups and downs of a checkered career.

Since the time I had received a verbal propulsion from the paternal roof I had been more or less of a soldier of fortune; just now, I was really a "first walking gent," out of an engagement. Of course, I knew there were a dozen managers who would presently be dying to get my signature for the season; but they were keeping quiet for the last stroke of the clock. Between these long summer days and the early hours of autumn there would indeed be starving space several times over. Evidently, something must be done. A notice received that morning concerned a three-weeks' board bill, and contained a hint that presence at the breakfast table would be disagreeable unless the amount mentioned was previously liquidated.

The why and wherefore of this stern estoppel from the privilege of Mrs. Murray's boarding house do not need explanation. It is enough to say that pride compelled the acceptance of the situation as I found it there. Nevertheless, I could not find it in my heart to be altogether hopeless.

"There certainly should be some way, some temporary expedient, by which the chasm can be bridged. If the Parcae will only show me the straw I will provide the clutch of the drowning man."

So I muttered to myself, sinking down upon one of the benches in the square. At that very moment, by chance, my hand touched a paper, abandoned there by some casual reader.

I picked it up carelessly.

"Better late than never. Let us see whether there is not something which will apply. Anything under the sun will do, from bank cashier here to woodchopper in Oregon—with transportation furnished, of course. Ah, ha! Here is something."

"WANTED—A FOOTMAN—One who understands the care of horses preferred. Apply tomorrow at 2 p. m., Avenue Z, 997. References required."

I looked all through the other wants and then came back to Avenue Z. It was the only thing which offered the least consolation.

"There's not a soul in town who remembers me; if there were one, what difference? When I am made up for my part my own mother wouldn't know me. Thank Heaven, my dunnage is not at Mrs. Murray's! I'll give the thing a whirl, anyhow."

Thinking thus, I strode away. There was yet ample time to put in an appearance at 997 before 2 o'clock.

Of course I found the place without trouble. Indeed, I could hardly have missed it. When I turned into the avenue I could see a crowd in the distance, which looked very like a mob. At the least, there were two score of people in it, all shoving and pushing, and some shouting in no good humor.

I say all, but I should not quantify that to trifle. There were several men straddled to fierceness on the handle of the doorbell; one man was bending over, trying to peer under the closely-drawn curtain of a window; whilst still another was clinging to the branch of a tree on the corner, from which a view of the second floor might possibly be obtained. The house itself is a deserted, evil-looking box, of course, making me suspect a practical joke.

However, I had come this far and did not intend to throw away a chance. If a selection was to be made from this mob, I certainly was as likely as any of them to be the lucky man. I strolled forward with a jaunty air in keeping with my supposed character, and halted at the step.

The man of two was the stroke, and the crowd, as if by unanimous consent, wedged up closer to the steps. "I'll be fellow who had conquered at the bell gave a vigorous tug, and in the midst of the harsh jangle I became conscious that two ladies were standing at my shoulder. Distinctly I heard an agitated, feminine whisper, followed by the words:

"Dear me! It is a perfect bear garden. What shall we do?"

"Send for a policeman. There seems to be no way of getting to the door. The mob can be handled. I declare! One of them is making preparations to mount the window sill. How you might have expected!"

"A policeman will hardly be competent for the task. I think it will require a regiment of the National Guard, at least."

From hasty inference I decided the two were mother and daughter. Though they seemed somewhat worried, an undercurrent of amusement in their voices precluded the idea of actual alarm on their part. As for the allusion to the man at the window—he really seemed to have burglarious intentions. I listened for the answer; and now the voice of the speaker assumed a tone of mild vexation:

At all events, we cannot get in until this rush has ceased. Dear me!"

That settled it with me. I liked the voice, and without a second thought bounded up the steps, elbowed the two hirsute fiends right and left and pitched him over on the heads of the crowd below. I just caught the fellows who stood at the doorbell, with a collar in each, and ran them down the pavement, sweeping half a dozen stragglers along, and fairly landed them all in the gutter. Then I turned swiftly back. I gave my hat a touch, remarking in my most stagey brogue:

"Sure, ladies, the way wor opin without the collar av the good."

They had already slipped up the steps, and the younger was inserting a latch key. The elder beckoned me to her with her finger.

"Come in at once. I think you are the man I want. We will telephone for the police if this rabble remains."

I fripped up, rather proud of my prowess, though more than half expecting to receive a missile or two on the broad of my back. Had one been hurled at me, indeed, I would have been surprised, and to this day I believe it was fortunate for me that someone stalked around the corner. He had no difficulty in managing a crowd which in my heart I was willing should be considered not to go beyond my capacity. The groan it gave me the closed door on the other side was something awful.

"Now, then, who are you, and what do you want?"

It was the elder lady still who spoke to me; but I had not made up my mind as to the relationship of the two I might have been using a good deal of the term elder. In my inner self, however, I silently grinned, thinking we were both more or less "made up"—self-conceal being one, if any, ravages of forty years; I to look any indeterminate age over thirty-five I responded promptly:

"Considine O'Rourke, shtable bye an' shriver be thrade, an' willin' to see how Oi kin best be made be hand at anything itse ye may choose to put me to. Oi'm the advertisemint; an' av ye wants an illegant, intilligint, competint man to look after the bys, it's bad luck Oi have had, an' the hartud toimes bein' been most disthressful."

"Have you a wife?"

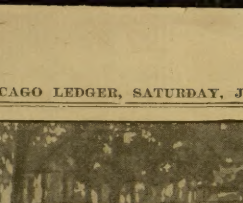
"Not at present; but av it was a necessity—sure, Oi think Oi would find it hartud to obtain wan."

I said this with as much earnestness that the lady smiled; and that smile lit up a face of great beauty as she glanced over at her daughter, who nodded.

"I'm bit upon the very qualifications for which I was going. I am inclined to think that when educated in your duties you would prove both intelligent and competent. If your references are satisfactory I shall at least give you a trial."

"Sure, an' a mon can have riffrinces for annything, but it's the shkill that counts. Oi wor in a thrainin' shtable in the owld country, an' dr'y a cab an' ixpries wagon here. Av ye will thry me a wake you'll know me bether; an' that wor all Oi ask."

I handed her the papers of Considine



The Enduring Spirit of '76 Outlasts the Centuries.

O'Rourke, candidate, which had last seen the light on the stage at the Follies, away down South, when I was playing in a local skit—"Wanted—A Coachman."

She glanced carelessly at my credentials, and as she looked from them to me I could see by the set of her lips that she had made up her mind. I was truly thankful the drawn curtains dimmed the light so that it was not likely she could detect the flush of joy in my face. "Success." I had sufficient confidence in my "dressing," but it had been done in haste. She spoke positively:

"Since writing that advertisement, John, my coachman, whom I had thought of discharging, has left me without warning, and as you seem to take his place I will give you a trial in the stables. Things are probably at sixes and sevens there, and I will not expect too much from you for several days. You will find a suit not far from your size in the coachman's closet. If we come to terms I will see to it your regular outfit is properly provided. Thomas will show you to the stables, and give you any needed information about the house."

When my conductor appeared he proved to be a boy of eighteen, and by word came that he was charmed with my general appearance. He certainly said no more than he had to.

Having the use of my eyes, I cared little for the stalls, were evidently the habitations of wealth; and my room upstairs in the stable was furnished after a fashion which would have made my late landlady turn green with envy if she could have seen it.

John was a fool," I thought to myself, as I looked around. "When I once get in the saddle, Daly will have to bid high if he wants to get me away from here."

I asked some questions in regard to the house and the cuisine, and then turned to my chosen field. They had cared for by a man temporarily called in from a livery barn, but I decided at first sight they needed exercise. Mrs. Marchmont seemed of the same opinion. It was by word came that she wished to be driven to Central Park.

I harnessed up and went around to the front of the house, where I arrived as the ladies stepped forward. And just at that method of our progress as he came into sight—three pounds and then a lunch—was not reassuring, but they took their seats without showing timidity, allowing me to get down from the box and then I gently eased to do. Thomas closed the door behind them, and as usual I knew all was right.

Steady hands on the reins soon brought the horses to their bearings by the time Fifth Avenue was reached I knew them much better than I did their mistress. Fortunately, I was considerably in the lead, and outs of the place, and required no explanation of the orders given on entering the carriage.

"Now, drive slowly, O'Rourke," the mistress said, leaning forward, and just at that moment I brought my whip down sharply and cracked forward at a pace that was neither staid nor slow. Some distance away I had caught sight of a driverless horse dashing straight toward the spot where we were almost caught in a jam.

CHAPTER II.

A MIDNIGHT VISITOR.

It was well I was the competent man I had proclaimed myself. To have remained in the crush would have simply meant wreck; an attempt to back around would only have accelerated the catastrophe.

I gave a quick look forward at the runaway horses and there was a clear space to my right. At once I swung aside, just in time to avoid the tearing team which dashed past. I had scarcely more than subdued our somewhat startled span when a crash rose above the cries we could hear behind us; then other crashes. I do believe there were a dozen vehicles in trouble.

"Ay ye desarves it, me laddy, Oi can tole the time an' go to the bilp av them. Oi moight be av some reinforcemint."

"Certainly not. The park police will attend to that, to say nothing of the idlers. You have done very well, I must say. John would have allowed us to suffer utter wreck sooner than have moved without orders."

I heard a silvery laugh, and then the voice of the daughter.

"It was just as you ordered him to drive slowly that he applied the lash. What kind of discipline are you introducing now?"

I straightened myself up, having no desire to hear comments on my course. I knew I had not hurt my self-respect with my employer.

"Where on slowly, now," was the order a moment later; and looking neither to the right nor the left, though actually taking in everything in sight, I moved on from the spot.

Before I had gone a dozen yards I was again face to face with a test. I am glad to say I stood the ordeal without sign of error.

A young man strolling toward us looked up questioningly. I knew him on the instant. It was Reggie Algire, a young blood of the "four hundred" I had met in winter ago. Did he remember me?

For the moment I could have sworn that he did. I caught a puzzled look on his face; then he gave me a nod and a wave of his hand.

I sat bolt upright, stiff as a switch stand, and was driving on when I heard my employer:

"Stop, O'Rourke!"

I suspected the truth as I saw Algire step toward the carriage. Lucky for me I had not betrayed myself.

"Mrs. Marchmont! Miss Lorena! This is an unexpected pleasure."

He spoke cordially, and the way he was received showed that he was on intimate terms with the family.

So the daughter's name was Lorena! I thought of the old song. I had hummed so many times in the past; but though this particular lady was famous, I doubted if I could ever fancy her strongly.

I was not very susceptible by nature, and in spite of some shady environments, which at times had been mine by right of chance and my profession, I was rather a clean, healthy-hearted young man, if I must say it myself. I had been sought in my time, as you can well believe if you know anything of the stage, and the opportunities of the past few months had each mistaken intrigues as might be interesting enough to the young man of average morals always rose against my gorge.

Mrs. Marchmont had made no mistake in taking me in my new role. I would not be apt to turn my eyes toward her daughter.

I was much puzzled. How about the lady herself? At the moment I showed no inclination outwardly than the head of a pump, yet I was aware that this woman, whom I had met that afternoon for the first time in my life, had gained more over me stronger than I had ever before felt.

A lady? Of course she was a lady. I could see it in every turn of her lip, every movement of her shapely hands, every word which fell from between her clearly-cut lips.

And proud? I knew that, too. It was worth something to be her servant, and chuckle over the gulf she imagined to be between us. But if she ever found out! I had been a mountebank a couple of hours, and already I had resolved she never should.

Meantime, I was not of the kind to overhear a conversation in which I could not join, and I shared straight forward, mentally chuckling at my ears. Nevertheless, I did catch a few words, through no desire of mine, just in the moment before Reggie turned away.

"He was in a very ugly humor when I saw him, and you can depend upon it they will be trouble in the air. I only mention it that you may be on your guard."

"Thank you; good-day," was Mrs. Marchmont's reply, and Algire stepped off as jauntily as he had approached.

Those few words were not much to found a theory on, but it seemed to me I could scent a mystery. Certainly, I detected an uneasy feeling in the tones of the lady. A few moments later we left the park and paced sedately homeward.

That night, as I laid my head on the pillow, which was soft and white but which was in a stable nevertheless, I wondered what my venerable parents would think could they see me then. I knew mother would weep; I suspected father would swear in his grand old antebellum way—always provided there was no one in sight to take stock of their doings. In the face of the world they could be stoical as Spartans, and die before showing a wound.

As for myself—well, here I was, the possible heir to a million or more, living in a barn and touching my hat to a mistress; consorting with the grooms, and a page, and others of that ilk, and doomed to a livery; all because I had attempted to be immoravable when met by the irresistible; because, once upon a time, I wanted my way—and took it. If I had behaved myself there was no reason why I should not be looking forward to dancing at the Patriarchs the next winter; and perhaps handing Mrs. Marchmont and Lorena to supper. I smiled grimly as I thought of it, wondering vaguely if, after all, the Marchmonts were quite enough in the 4 swim to be worth such a place.

They were wealthy, I knew well enough, but I was not so sure they were at the centre de la creme as to make me envy Mr. Considine. If they were, what held them in town this time in the year?

Revolving such matters I fell asleep. Two or three hours later I awoke with the consciousness there was someone in the room.

Fortunately, I was self-possessed as you please, excellent just where I was and there was most likely the matter. An intruder there was apt to be of the more brutal class of burglars. Had I been a man of the world doubtless be willing to murder on the off chance of finding the valuables I was in search. I quietly withdrew a revolver from its resting place under my pillow, and, seeing an indistinct figure moving in the room, sat up.

"Hands up, I command. Throw a shtip an' ye're a did mon."

"Stop your pardon," responded a voice, and the speaker appeared to be a great deal cooler than I was.

"Not a bit mistake here. You are not John."

"No, be not John; the bether for him, be the same token. Who are you?"

"I am a friend of Considine's. For a moment I thought of the scapegrace son of the stage, and wondered whether John had not been in league with him to rob after the interests of the outcast to his employer. From the tone in which it suggested something of the kind, though letting nothing appear.

"I am an old friend of the former coachman, whose place you seem to have taken. He left town in a hurry, and I had a note, and when down John has always made me welcome. You wouldn't be so accommodate me for the night, I suppose?"

"Not av I knew exactly what to say, but yez an' Oi will drap yez a fall from the windy av ye don't."

"That is kind, and so are you are a sensible fellow. Your mistress would not want to see her name in the paper connected with a coroner's inquest. I'm going. Here's the key. I'll drop it in the window. Don't suppose it will be of further use to me."

He tossed the key over his head and stepped out of the window by the aid of the stairs and out on the street, never troubling himself to fix the lighten the sash or an atom.

Quite at my leisure I followed, to see that the door was properly shut and locked. Perhaps I had done wrong to allow him to escape, but I was unarmed, and had I had recognized the force of what he said about the mistress wishing her name to figure in the report of a police court or a coroner's jury. And then, it was new to the stage, and I was more than half as much a thing as being officious overmuch. I went back to bed, resolved to be more considerable thought, to wake only, and safe, at daylight.

About the middle of the morning Mrs. Marchmont called for me. I had already discovered my position was a responsive, but had taken hold with prompt understanding. Having been a mimic-making artist at one period of my variegated career would be fatal, no of mimicry, probably. When the message came it found me in gloves, overalls and short jacket, in the shortest possible time I appeared smooth and sleek, in my uniform.

Mrs. Marchmont intended to be well satisfied as she looked me over.

"That will do. I have taken you into service on short notice and without much investigation. I needed some one at once, and was pleased to find you acquainted with which you relieved a somewhat disagreeable duty. Thomas has been employed in a case of danger during our drive confirmed me in my opinion. Discretion on the tongue is not usually a crowning virtue of servants, but if I find it in you I will consider you an ideal one."

"Sure, an' av it tuithed ye Oi could be doing no nothing."

"Oh, no. I do not ask quite that much. Now, about your duties, O'Rourke." Mrs. Maxwell, who preceded you in the stables, had some undesirable acquaintances, and it was necessary to get rid of them. I have no wish to get rid of them. I hope you will not have them."

"No danger. Wan av him visited me the noight noight, an' a misthrustworthy av the situation. He had a key lift him by John, an' whin Oi gave him the choice av the key or the windy he put the key on his an' tuk the door."

I knew that I had not been entirely mistaken in my suppositions. In spite of wonderful self-possession, there were evident signs of agitation, and Mrs. Marchmont gave a swift glance toward Lorena. What she might have said I cannot guess, for an interruption cut off answer to me entirely. An individual whom Thomas had admitted came striding along the hall and threw open the door with an ungentle wrench. He was tall, broad-shouldered as myself, and had it not been for lines on his face, telling of dissipation and cruelty, he might have been considered boldly handsome.

He looked around with an appearance of possessorship I did not altogether like, yet there was a certain indefinable air which marked the intruder. I turned to Mrs. Marchmont.

"Give me the wink, yer leddyship, an' out he goes."

"Get out of here yourself, Paddy, or I'll take you all apart!" exclaimed the stranger savagely. "Her ladyship happens to be my wife."

CHAPTER III.

FORWARD, AT ALL HAZARDS.

At this astounding revelation—if revelation it was—I saw Mrs. Marchmont writhen for a moment to the roots of her hair. Yet, behind the agonized look in her eyes, there was something which told that though she might be on the defensive she had no thought of surrender. Had there been signs of weakness I would have retired, in spite of a quiet gesture from Miss Leona. It is an ill thing to interfere between man and wife.

There was a triumphant devil in the old man's face that made me forget all that. We were fairly well matched in build, and I judged I was in the better condition, but I could hardly expect to evict him without a brawl which would be more or less unseemly in such a place. Nevertheless, I was hoping for aggressive orders when I foiled my arms, without seeming to pay attention to him, and quietly remarked:

"Shall we go, my lord? Really, I'm av ye don't want to shpake it my nothin' at all, at all, but ye owe thinkin' he's a bloody intruder."

"Yes, speak to him, do—and order him to have his skull crushed. I am in no humor for foolishness."

This he said in an ordinary tone; but it was to throw me off my guard. Without warning, as he thought, he suddenly dashed in, striking as he came.

"Treat him out, Geraldine," I heard Mrs. Marchmont coldly say, as I countered, striking with only half my reach, but seeding for the body and strong, landing on the point of the jaw. I lifted him fairly off his feet and stretched him straight out, half-way through the open door.

That I rushed in caught him up as though I had all my life been a professional bouncer. As my lady had remarked, he was a fool to see that my duties were "varied"; but so long as they were legitimate and the situation, I intended to show competency for all of them.

Educated by the practice of the previous day, and inspired by the cause, I deported the man from the room with neatness and dispatch, carried him down the front steps and deposited him with average gentleness on the pavement.

"Now get out wid ye or we'll call the police," was my advice, and, for a wonder, he took it. The blow had not altogether knocked him out, but he went away in a somewhat dazed condition, muttering a threat which I did not think it worth while to seem to hear. The street and ease with which I had handled him had broken his brutal spirit to the finest point.

Once assured he did not at present intend to make more trouble, I closed the door and returned to the conversation which had been interrupted rather than concluded.

The ladies were where I had left them, both a trifle pale. Miss Lorena was the first to rally, she came shyly forward, holding out as pretty a palm as I would ever ask to grasp.

"Mr. O'Rourke, shake hands. I humbly apologise for having rather underrated you. I have received a gratification for which I scarcely know how to be thankful enough, and I believe you may be same for my mother. But oh! do be careful. The wretch will try his best to have revenge, and will not care how he takes it."

The efflorescence of gratitude was rather overpowering, but I knew how to act especially as Mrs. Marchmont remained silent. I managed to stammer out something which had been sorry enough to hit the lady's father, and was hardly prepared for the look of intense scorn which I received.

"Stop! I repudiate that entirely. He may be my mother's husband, but certainly is no father of mine. He is simply her unworthy second. When mother found him out she got rid of him as well as she could, portioning him off a good deal more liberally than he had a right to expect, and he has now no rights here. If you care to remain with me, as I truly ahead of you, throw him out whenever he comes. I am sure mother will endorse the order and trust in your discretion. There are not a dozen in New York who know the secret you have just learned."

I had not thought her capable of the excitement which she showed. Her face flushed, her eyes flashed, her hands, which still clasped mine, unwittingly, no doubt, was quivering. I thought I had never in my life seen a more beautiful young woman.

"You forget yourself, Lorena," calmly interposed Mrs. Marchmont. "Of course we are grateful to Mr. O'Rourke; but he has probably learned to take such things as matters of course. Nevertheless"—turning to me—"I would have you understand I endorse what my daughter has said. Watch yourself or you may be left out behind. Unless you have special orders to the contrary, you will never go wrong in keeping that individual out of this house. He shall neither bully nor force me to alter in one jot the conditions I have signed. If he makes his way in here after dark, shoot him down."

Her feelings began to overpower her again. The concentrated tone of hate in which this last order was given showed me every word was meant, and when I looked at her, and thought of him, I felt for the moment that what she might be the cool I would obey to the letter. Nevertheless, I must have appeared a little foolish as I stood there to be petted with acknowledgments. Though controlling myself fairly well, I was glad to be dismissed with a benediction and the information I would not be wanted again that morning.

Back at the stable, with overalls resumed, I began to think matters over as calmly as I could.

Repugnant though it was to delve among their private affairs, I made up my mind I must know more about this family before deciding on my future course. At first, I had thought that if I remained a week I could accumulate a little capital that, carefully husbanded, might see me over the worst of the barrens on which I was wandering; and I should not had rather a jolly lark. Now I began to fancy perhaps it might not be such a bad thing to rest in this haven until the days of fall engagements came around. Then, if managers not fates proved propitious, why, confound them! I might remain Considine O'Rourke indefinitely, even if I did not continue to be a coachman.

The day passed stong without further adventure. In the evening I obtained permission to absent myself to look after my impedimenta. I accomplished that in short order, and then made the acquaintance of "my uncle," leaving with him some articles which I could readily spare. After that I went to a detective agency of which I knew something, but where it was not likely Considine O'Rourke, whose money was as good as that of anyone, would be recognised. In a week I would no doubt know all about the Marchmonts, and something about the man who claimed to be my employer's wife. That was what the clerk told me; and I had a great deal of confidence in the astuteness of Mr. Beamish and the industry of his staff.

As I strode away, up Broadway, independent of you please in spite of my disguise, for the first time in years I felt what you might call a thrill of happiness. How strange it seemed! Here was I, down about as low as I could well get and preserve my self-respect, a boy homeward bound from a pawnbroker's, yet admitting to myself I was the proud possessor of the pendigal, though I had an idea I would meet with an warm reception at home. I felt I would never rise in the profession I had so foolishly adopted, and was meanwhile cutting myself on society, nothing of a future. There were other women than Mrs. Marchmont who might be years younger and able to attract me still more, yet they were not for me. Why, for the time being I was actually mad to break away from the life of the past few years and at that moment I could have come face to face with the old gentleman it is just possible I would have fallen on his neck and shouted.

I got over that, however. The nearer I came to Avenue Z the less I realised that I had anything to bemoan. As a matter of corner I became Considine O'Rourke once more, coachman by profession and guardian of two as fascinating ladies as I cared to see. A trifle later I locked up from the stable to the house with all silent and slumberous. Nevertheless, the spirit of disquietude was upon me, and I determined that it might not be amiss to look about a little before retiring in my own humble quarters.

To my surprise, as I approached the building some one came out of the door at the rear, and was slipping away, gripsack in hand. At a second glance I recognised Thomas, Orderly. I would have stopped the boy, but something in his movements and manner suggested that he was up to no otherwise. Lurking in the shadows I allowed the youth to pass me, then quietly entered the house.

Of course, if I was mistaken in my suspicions I would be in a ridiculous charm; if I went blundering on there was no telling how soon I might be in the soup.

Despite such dangers, the openness of the path led me on, finding my way by a faintly gleaming light in the upper hallway. At the foot of the stairway I stopped for a moment to listen. Not a sound broke the silent haste, bounding up two steps at a time. I had been above and one of them was the voice of a man.

Above, a glow rather than a gleam of light streamed through an aperture left by a scantily opened door, showed me which way the sounds came. As I drew nearer, a farther, a low medley of sounds was audible in an adjoining room, but before I reached the same, I could distinguish them apart. There was low, hurried breathing for the first, and for the second, behind draperies, above which rose what I rightly guessed was the head of a gas bundle, pulled by a nervous hand. Then a low, wicked voice:

"I am giving you plenty of time because, as I willingly confess, I do not want to kill you. That has been the policy of the cowardly bully of the barn is provided for. The burglary business has been suspended, and I am with me would take care of it if any assistance should come. It seems to me that by I effected an entrance there is no law in the land which would punish me for breaking open the house. So, my dear wife, at last I mean to have a little confidential conversation with you, after which we may decide to better advantage what the next move shall be."

Very distinctly I hear all this, and very devoutly did I wish for the revolver which was stowed away in my valise. It was most likely that the mention of his companions was only a bluff on the part of fellow was rightful husband it was certain that the liberty, and most likely the life of the lady were in danger. Mrs. Marchmont spoke, I was glad to see there was no fear in her voice, but that most likely the width of the room separated the two. I listened eagerly, for from the words used in some way indicate what course I had best pursue.

"I do not fear you, Marcus Whetstone, and I give you fair warning that if you kill me you will only get the most contemptible punishment, but even if it passes unsuspected it will not profit you. My death ends your pension, and you are known to the entire condition of affairs, but I swear to you this is the truth. More than that, I may be willing to overlook this intrusion now: I never will again. Attempt to bring your self and my into close relation than that which has existed and she of us dies. I am a desperate woman, who has so far held her own against you and the rest of the world, and I intend to keep that up to the end. If you are wise you will go your way quietly, and at once."

So the man's name was Whetstone! He laughed a low, bitter laugh, and went on recklessly:

"I tell you, I do not care a whiffet how soon death comes, so it hits both of us. There is a desperate pair of us, and I have stood your nonsense too long. You must bend or break."

"And how, pray, is this bending to be accomplished?"

"Come back with you, had not things gone wrong, by this time you would have been quietly and unconsciously removed to my husband's domicile. It may not be as magnificent as this, but the home influence would be decidedly superior."

"And as it is?"

"You will go with me quietly, and all the same."

By this time I was looking in upon them. I had no certain his assistant ruffians, if he had any, were not in the room with me, and it was hardly likely they were with him. My only fear was that they might overpower Lorena in their power. Otherwise, it seemed strange she had not come in evidence.

Mrs. Marchmont was cool as you please. In her turn she laughed—a bitter, joyless laugh—and carelessly waved her hand between them.

"The day for such folly is past. You may have been a grand master in such spells, but I have learned a thing or two since then, and, be—taking a step toward him—"in such things, if anything, I am your master, and all influence you may have had is done with forever. Now that you know it you had best remember. Every threat I have made will be made good to the limit, and it is only I have no weapon in hand that there is a chance for you to go out of this house alive."

He glared at her, plainly, forced to believe in the truth of what she said, yet unwilling to admit or attempt brutal physical force. After all, he was playing his hand as carefully as he knew how, and could not believe as yet, that he would not win.

As for her, she spoke harsh, wicked words; and yet she could have done no better. They were her only weapons, and she had to wield them as best she could.

"There is one thing you forget, my dear," he said, after a brief silence. "If I cannot have you, I can hang you. Sooner than have you conquer, by the heavens! I will do it. I have only to feel how long enough for the sake of the paltry sum you have rung me out of your millions. All other means first, fair or foul. Afterward—that!"

He hissed out his ultimatum with a vicious anger which had been kept down till now, but which would soon carry him away in spite of himself. I saw the crisis was coming, but how he was to make use of threat and more of violence for the future; and that it was time to act. There was no further knowledge of his schemes which Mrs. Marchmont would be likely to claim from him by prolonging the interview, and I was not certain how soon her nerves would fail. I drew myself together for a spring.

At that same instant, a woman's scream—it was from the lips of Lorena—rang through the house, and a pair of strong arms were thrown around me from behind. Despite my caution, a foe had taken me unaware.

CHAPTER IV.

Poor ill-fated Ruby! Over and over again she read the letter of explanation which Lawrence had sent her, trying hard to realize what it all meant. That fatal marriage notice, which had worked such irreparable wrong, had been cut from the paper and enclosed in the letter; and as she read it and began to understand whose had been the deep, underhanded treachery that had been the cause of Lawrence's rash marriage, a feeling that was as near akin to hatred as anything that gentle Ruby Gordon was capable of feeling sprang up within her heart against the Leslie Darrell.

They had been lifelong friends, and he and Lawrence had long been fast suitors for her hand. To Lawrence she had given the deep, true, earnest love of her heart, while the other friend had been esteemed most highly. But she now felt that she could never forgive the bitter wrong that he had done.

She had long felt that old Reuben Armytage was half demented, and she could well understand the part to be played in the plot; she could also understand one of Lawrence's natures, hot-tempered and impetuous ground, committing in a moment of reckless despair a rash act such as he had committed, but she could not understand how Leslie could lead one to do a deed that would break the heart of the object of their love, for by Leslie Darrell's treacherous deed her life was darkened—ruined.

She now scanned the dark, sullen look that had come over his face when she told him that she was engaged to Lawrence, and his eyes had gleamed like fire and his voice was hoarse with passion, as he said:

"But you shall never be his wife, Ruby Gordon, never! I shall see to that!"

She had regarded the words at the time as an idle threat, but she now realized how true they had been.

She took up the letter again and let her eyes rest for a long time on the closing words which it began: "My dearly loved and lost darling." Ah! they were indeed lost to each other. They would meet often, but they must meet as acquaintances only. Could they do it, when once they had been all the world to each other? If Lawrence had been false in his love to her, if he had wronged this girl because he had learned to love her better than herself, she would resolutely have torn his image from her heart and would have set herself the task of forgetting him. But knowing as she now knew, she did, she felt that to forget him would be impossible, and to meet him every day as another woman was his wife would be worse than death. And yet, what was life to face them—a life of vain longings and still vainer regrets.

She folded her arms upon the window sill and laid her aching head upon them. No tears fell from her eyes, for she had cried until she could weep no more. Her face was ghastly pale and her features were set as if to have become petrified into a cast of despair. Long she sat there—so long that minutes ran into hours, and the afternoon melted into evening. She was trying to form some plan for the future that she could not, as it seemed to her that the future held nothing worth living for.

Death does not come at will, or it surely would have come to her. Life was a boon she no longer prized. It was a burden, a heavy burden, so she took up her old duties in a kind of weary mechanical way, for there was nothing could ever break.

Her dread of meeting with Lawrence kept her a great deal within doors. But one morning, feeling the need of making some purchases in the village, she chose that early hour, thinking that the inmates of the Elmwood mansion would be astir at a later time, and started forth.

There was a path through the grove that was much nearer than to go by the highway, but as this grove belonged to the Elmwood estate she had never walked along that way.

But its leafy coolness looked so inviting that she finally took the woodland path. How beautiful was the face of Nature this morning! The wild roses were blooming beneath her feet, the birds were singing above her head; and with the dewy freshness of the morning her spirits could not fail to be somewhat enlivened, and feeling better than she had before in many days, she went slowly through the grove, enjoying as best she could its sylvan beauties.

How often in the past she and Lawrence had walked this same leafy pathway together! Those happy, happy days were over and gone and their pure love in life was widely divided now. With this thought in her heart she paused and looked back. Her mind was again filled with sad thoughts and once again she fell to dreaming of the past.

But from this dream she had a rude awakening. The sound of footsteps falling on her ears brought her back to herself at a start, and on turning round she found herself face to face with Leslie Darrell.

She had dreaded a meeting with him almost as much as she had dreaded meeting with Lawrence Armytage. She stepped back with a stifled exclamation, but he caught her hand in his and his face beamed.

"Ruby," he said, softly, "this is indeed good fortune! I did not expect to meet you. I was going over to your place to see you; now I will turn and walk back to the village with you. I may, may I not?"

"I suppose so," she answered, in a hesitating way, "but really, Mr. Darrell—"

"Mr. Darrell!" he interrupted, reproachfully. "What is the matter? You have always called me Leslie before."

"Well, you may be thankful that I do not call you villain now." And the tone of her voice betrayed how great was her agitation.

He looked uneasy, he understood her perfectly and knew how senseless it would be to feign ignorance of the meaning of her words.

"So you think I have played the part of a villain, do you, Ruby? Well, remember that it was my great love for you that compelled me to do the deed. Have you any idea how much I love you?"

"I have not. A love like yours is something I cannot understand—a love that causes one to do a deadly wrong to the object of that love. Leslie Darrell, why did you do such a wicked thing?"

"You know well enough why I did it. I want you for myself. That marriage notice shall be repeated some day and it will then tell the truth."

"Never! You must be insane to think that I will."

"Wait!" and he raised his hand with a commanding gesture. "Speak not rashly. You may not understand how I dared to do as I did, but you must understand the delightful sense of triumph I now feel. It is a love such as Lawrence Armytage, weak, vain, effeminate creature that he is, could never have felt if he had loved you with all his soul."

Ruby's eyes were blazing now.

"How dare you," she cried, "speak such words to me in my own presence! He is—"

"Defend him if you will," he again interrupted, "but your own heart must tell you he is a contemptible coward to have done as he did. I knew him well—knew just what the hot-headed fool would do if he believed you were false to him. Ruby, you deserve a husband with more strength of mind and character than Lawrence has."

"Never mind what I deserve; what I desire is the thought to be considered. And if I were to marry now I should desire a man with more honor than you have shown. Lawrence Armytage is weak, effeminate, but he is an honorable man. And, having won my love, he has a right to demand and will transfer my affections to one like you, dishonorable as you have shown yourself to be."

Darrell sneered.

"Then you call Lawrence Armytage an honorable man! Do you think that his marriage to Elsie has made him true? Not true in thought, word and deed to the innocent girl whom he has ruined, no doubt not that long before this he has sought your presence with his weak, senseless excuses for what he has done, and with words of undying love on his lips."

Ruby felt that her poor depraved mind has led you astray, for he has done no such thing."

"But he will. And you will listen to him, and you will not forget that another woman has the right to his love—the name of honor! You, yourself, will soon learn that there is a thing far more valuable by the temptation of a mighty love."

He paused and drew his side while talking, and he now paused in his walk and sought to take her hand.

"But, Ruby, why this quarrel?" he continued, "I love you too well for that. Give me a kiss of peace, and let us walk on our life so happy that, in time, you will bless me for what you now call a dishonorable act."

Proudly she drew herself back.

"I would not kiss you on earth and I were the last woman," she answered in a voice trembling with scorn and hatred. "I despise you! I wonder at myself that I ever thought you honest."

They were both greatly agitated, and neither of them heard the footsteps that were approaching them.

"But you shall not always scorn my love!" he cried. "Ruby, you will be mine yet—as well. I have but to scheme a little farther and I shall at last cause you to become my wife as I caused Lawrence Armytage to become the husband of another. I would win you by fair means if I could, but many me you shall!"

He grasped her arm as he spoke, and the next instant a well-directed blow from behind sent him bellowing with pain and indignation stamped on every feature. "Scoundrel!" cried Lawrence, "I ought to kill you where you lie!"

Ruby stifled the scream that rose to her lips as she saw the blow the hand had dealt the blow. But when, the next instant, Darrell had risen to his feet, and faced his assailant with a murderous gleam in his eyes, all unconsciously she sprang to Lawrence's side, and, grasping his arm, she cried: "Oh, Lawrence!"

Lawrence had not once removed his eyes from the face of his foe. "Stand back!" he cried, as Darrell with a muttered curse sprang toward him, "I do not care to quarrel with you in her presence. Were it not for that I would give you the thrashing you deserve!" And he threw one arm around Ruby's form in a protecting way, while with the other he restrained him back.

Darrell paused and with a mocking sneer on his handsome face said: "You had your wife once see you now!" Then turning to Ruby he added: "Oh, the boasted honor of you two! Did I not tell you how it would be?"

Lawrence was now nearly beside himself with rage and but for Ruby's clinging hands he would have dealt him another blow.

"Ah, yes," Darrell again sneered, as he read the threatening look on Lawrence's face, "you can be very brave when a woman stands between you and all possible harm! We cannot fight in your presence, it is true, but we shall meet again—then beware!"

And with these words he turned and left them, muttering curses as he did so.

Ruby read relief in Darrell's face from Lawrence's protecting arms. A sick, faint sensation of deepest despair came over her, and she did not even resent the tears that would fall from her eyes.

Lawrence paused for a moment and gazed in silence at the white, pitiful face.

"I heard what you said to that sneak, and I am glad to know that you scorn him as he deserves to be scorned. I have lost you, myself—and, as a matter of course, sob threatened to choke him—"but I would rather see you dead, my darling, at this length, "than married to him, now that I know him as I do. But I promise you, Ruby—I have no right to ask it, I know—but promise me that you will never change your love for Lawrence Armytage for that sneak."

"I hate him! I shall never marry him—I could not—could, could never!"

Lawrence made no reply, but stood with both hands clasped in his, thoughtful expression on his face. He was wondering what he could say to this sweet girl who had been so cruelly wronged, whose happiness had been completely destroyed.

"Ruby," he presently said, "Elsie Darrell," he said, at length, "and that cowardly villain shall pay for the wrong they have done us by the deeply-laid plot which has worked out our eternal misery. But, Ruby," and he grasped her hand hard, "I promise you that, "it would lighten my burden of woe a little if I knew that you had hope in your life, believing, as I did, that you had been false to me."

"I forgive you, Lawrence, but oh! how could you have doubted me! How could you be guilty of such treachery as to require proof of my falseness. They bolt ought to have been sufficient. I had been false to one who has just left us and the deluded old reuben Armytage. And you could think me good would it do us? It would not bring back even one little hour of the old-time love that we had known. Oh, Lawrence, Lawrence, undone, Lawrence. We are hopelessly divided now."

The truth of her words struck a chill to his aching heart, but he suffered no despair, but never as now. He loved this girl dearer than life. He longed to take her in his arms and kiss away the tears that fell—to make her honor forbade it.

"Ruby, kneel before me is all darkness now," Ruby continued: "the only ray of light to cheer me in the future is—that you were not false in your love."

"Yes, I loved you!" he cried, in suppressed passion, "and I help me—I love you yet!"

"There will come a time, Lawrence, when you will not; that is, not as you do now—a time when your will be the same you your love now. This is right, but oh! the bitterness of the cruel thought. I cannot! I cannot! It would be wicked to feel in this way, wicked to talk as I do now, but, oh! we have been so terribly wronged. The fault is not ours."

Ruby's head sank, and she locked her voice, and leaning her head against the trunk of a tree she wept bitterly.

If your love is wicked," Lawrence could say, but, with a heart torn with anguish, he could not. He could only wait for the bitter weeping had ceased, he again took her hands.

"We must say good-by, Ruby—good by. I can never—"

"We must. But—— Oh, Lawrence!"

Her voice failed her again. This was the last time they would ever have together on the subject of their love. She felt wicked to speak now of such forbidden things, but it had been unsought, and the few endearing words that had passed between them might be excused, but they must never, never again. This farewell that was about to be spoken was for all time, for as their love was concerned, a farewell to all that was life worth living for.

"My lost darling!" There was unutterable sadness in Lawrence's voice as he said this; then, without another word, he folded her closely within his arms and the tears fell from his eyes upon her face as he kissed the silently pressed his lips to hers. Had the fates been kind to them, this kiss, this vow from his sight forever he could not have felt worse. Neither of them could say the word farewell. After one long, fast, lingering look into each other's eyes he released her, and each went their separate ways—alone.

CHAPTER V.

Old Reuben Armytage smiled to himself as he stood by the window in his room one morning and saw Lawrence and his wife walking together on the terrace. "He is a man of sense, anyway," he said. "He is going to make the best of the situation, and with better grace than I thought he would. Perhaps in time he may completely forget his love for Ruby Gordon."

With these thoughts the old man fell to musing. Had he, himself, ever forgotten the one love of his life? Could he, seven yet, recall that wonderously beautiful face that had for a while brightened his home, without a feeling of intense longing and despair—despair because that for which he longed could never be again?

He walked two or three times across the floor and then came back to the window. Lawrence and his wife were walking toward the house now, and as Lawrence raised his face, the old man detected an unmistakable look of weariness stamped upon it.

That look had never been there in the old days when he had roamed over the old place with Ruby Gordon. And a look of thoughtfulness took the place of the satisfied expression that had before rested on the old man's face.

"We must have a few visitors," he told himself. "They will claim his attention and he will have less time to brood over his trouble." And after breakfast he mentioned the idea to Lawrence and Bessie.

"And a ball, papa!" exclaimed Bessie as she came close to his side. She had, in the beginning of her life at Elmwood, formed the habit of calling him papa, and the old man seemed to like it. "I think you should give a ball in our honor!"

"The very thing!" he answered. "I wonder that I did not think of it before. Well, you and Lawrence talk it over; he will know whom to invite, and you, my dear, miscellaneous you said you had a grown-up sister to help you. She can remain during the remainder of the summer with you?"

"Yes, Leslie and Addie will, and Bessie twined her white arms about the old man's neck and gave him a kiss that brought the tears to his eyes. It was the first time years since he had felt the touch of a woman's lips upon his own, and it made his heart ache more better. I will write to Addie at once."

And she did. A letter to Addie Vincent, describing the beauties of the old place and telling her that she, too, was to be present, and that a ball was to be given that very morning. Addie would come, she knew. She was the daughter of a wealthy man with her brought a happier look to her face than she had worn before since she came to Elmwood.

She looked forward to the ball with the keenest delight, and her naturally light spirits were somewhat dampened by the disinterested manner in which Lawrence spoke about it. Only once had he shown any interest in the coming event, and that was when Ruby Gordon's name was mentioned by Bessie.

"Of course she must be invited," Bessie had said, "when Addie comes I shall ask she will come?"

Lawrence looked up quickly with the light of glad expectancy gleaming in his eyes; a moment later it faded and the old saddened look settled on his countenance.

"You are right: she must be invited," he answered. He knew that Bessie knew that she will come." And Bessie knew, as he knew, that Ruby would be there as guest.

"Of course she must be invited."

looked so miserable that it gave her a guilty feeling; so she had also decided that she would hide her unhappiness from him.

For many days she puzzled her mind as to how she was to form an acquaintance with Ruby Gordon. If she trusted to meeting her at the ball she might be disappointed, for she might not come; and, as she greatly desired that she should be among her guests, not that if she could come to know her at once she might induce her to attend.

So, with this thought in her mind, she took to wandering past the Gordon cottage whenever she went for a walk, and one day fortune favored her. As she drew near the place she saw Ruby gathering some flowers which were growing in picturesque confusion all about the yard. She would speak to her now. This was the opportunity she had sought.

"Good morning, Miss Gordon," she called, advancing to the rustic gateway. "I am going to take a great liberty this morning and ask you for a few violets. My sister is coming to visit me, and, as she is passionately fond of their perfume, I would like some for her room, and we have none at Elmwood. I am Mrs. Armytage," she added, as Ruby bent a confused, wondering look upon her, "but of course you know." And she timidly extended one little gloved hand over the gate.

For a moment Ruby Gordon's proud spirit rebelled. She felt that she could not clasp that hand—the hand that had been clasped within her lover's when the words were spoken that had built up a social barrier between them.

But the girl had meant no wrong. She also had been made to suffer; perhaps her sufferings were as great as her own. Almost in Ruby's ear, at the sweet, innocent-looking face and met the wistful look of the clear, blue eyes, her better nature triumphed; and without further hesitation she clasped hands with the wife of Lawrence Armytage, the woman who had, though unintentionally, robbed her life of all joy.

As the blood flush, looking into each other's eyes and realizing, as they did, how natural it would be for them to hate each other, each felt how noble it would be to bury all feelings of envy and enmity and be friends. And when Bessie, with a wildly beating heart and eyes that had grown misty with tears, expressed a wish that they might do this, Ruby's heart was completely won.

It was a strange picture which these two made as they seated themselves upon a garden seat and talked over the trouble that lay on near each heart. For they did talk, and when at last Bessie Armytage went slowly homeward, she bore within her hand a magnificent bunch of the fragrant violets which Ruby had given her as a pledge of their eternal friendship.

But her heart was now torn with conflicting emotions. She had promised to be a friend to Ruby Gordon, and she meant to be one; but deep down within her heart there still rankled the thought that this girl stood in the way of her ever winning her husband's love, and she knew, even now, that if Ruby should die, she could feel no sorrow. Ah! would she not be actually glad if this might happen? She knew she would. This was very wicked, but it was very like human nature, and there was nothing of the angel about this passionate little creature with whom Fate had dealt so harshly, although Ruby had called her one when she had mentally made for their friendship.

Ruby had promised to attend the ball, and after dinner, as Lawrence joined her in the flower-garden where they were now usually spent the twilight hours, she told him of what she had done.

For a moment he looked at her in astonishment and then he cried:

"Bessie, you have actually done this—friends with Ruby!" he asked, as he paused in his walk beside her and looked down into her face; and his voice had in it a ring of gladness as he continued: "Nothing would please me better than to have you two become friends; but is something I never dreamed of—never dared to hope for."

"Then you are not displeased with me, Lawrence, for having done this? I feared you might be."

"No, dear, I surely am not displeased with you; on the contrary, I feel that there is something truly noble and unselfish about you," and to her amazement he bent and kissed her tenderly.

How that kiss thrilled her very soul! But the next instant a bitter thought arose and filled her with remorse. He had done this because of the intense joy which the thought that Ruby Gordon would once again be a guest within his home—that once again she was to see her dear face and hear her well beloved voice.

She stifled the sigh that arose to her lips; but there was a tremor, as they were about to resume their walk, drew her arm within his—something she had never done before—she shuddered. She had won a little tenderness at last, but only by being kind to Ruby Gordon.

Her heart was so heavy with pain at this moment that it was with difficulty that she restrained herself from crying out with the awful misery of it all. She could have in her truly noble and unselfish, indeed, if she continued to be friendly with this girl through life. Could she do it, she wondered. Could she!

Perhaps Lawrence understood something of the thoughts that were passing within her mind, for after a silence of several moments had fallen between them, he said, in a voice that rang with sadness:

"You are a dear, sweet little woman, Bessie, and you deserve a better fate than has befallen you."

CHAPTER VI.

On the night of the ball, Elmwood was a blaze of light. The grand old entrance hall was lined with rare plants and flowers, among which shone lights of all colors. The whole suite of rooms had been thrown open, and, standing at the entrance, one seemed to look down an endless vista of flowers and lights.

And amid this costly splendor, the lonely woman, who was mistress of it all, stood, clad in robes of magnificence, and with an air of defiance about her that seemed to become her well, for she was truly beautiful and fascinating tonight.

Her sister stood by her side, for she had arrived the day before, and as she gazed at the costly and beautiful decorations she almost fancied herself in fairyland.

"How intensely happy Bessie must be!" she thought, for she knew nothing of the true state of affairs. And drawing nearer to her sister's side she said, in a laughing way: "I expect to meet my ideal tonight, and I hope he will be able to give me just such a glorious old home as you have made."

Bessie sighed.

"Wealth and position are not everything, Addie. If you meet your ideal, make sure that he has a heart to give you as well as a home."

Addie Vincent wondered greatly at her sister's words, but their full meaning did not come to her until long after. Her own loving words also came back to her in after days, bringing to her heart a feeling of passionate pain. She met her ideal, but oh, how worthless clay!

The carriages had begun to arrive now, and, standing by her sister's side, Bessie received her guests in a manner that betrayed nothing of the pain-agony of her heart. She had set herself the task of playing a great part in the drama of life tonight, and she had resolved to do it well.

From curiosity the guests came early. All were anxious to be present at the opening of the ball. Bessie knew well that inquisitive eyes were constantly fixed upon her face, that every one was wondering how she would receive her rival, and that the least shadow of pain that might come to her face would be at once noted and commented upon. No one should have that "You scoundrel!"

She played her part to perfection. When Ruby Gordon arrived, her lips were wreathed in smiles and her eyes were bright with seeming delight as she, in her charming, gracious way, received her.

There was some little commotion in the room while this act was being played. No one could help admiring the sweet, cordial way in which the welcome was extended by some of them at once voted her an angel, while others said that she was not to be envied that she had married Lawrence for the wealth which he would one day inherit, and that she cared not that his heart had been given to another.

Ruby Gordon had long been the acknowledged belle of every social gathering, but tonight public attention was divided between these two whose paths in life had crossed so fatally for them. Lawrence, tall and handsome, and Bessie, beautiful—the darkeyed Ruby in a simple evening dress of white, standing out in picturesque contrast to the fair-haired bride in white silk and pearls, which, by the way, Bessie knew suited to admire the more.

But while Bessie managed to hide her unhappiness, Ruby did not; indeed, she did not try to. Every one knew that she and Lawrence had been lovers, and knew that they had been engaged; why should she wish the world to believe that they have had been so weak that the barrier which an act of treachery and folly had placed between them had killed it—that it no longer existed? There was no reason why she should wish to dissemble, and if there had been, she could not have done it well, she was too truthful by nature.

She made no exhibition of her feelings, but her lips were no forced smiles, and there was an air of sadness about her that was apparent to all.

Only once did she dance with Lawrence. He asked her for the first waltz, and although she debated within her mind whether it would give her pain or pleasure, she did not refuse.

After the waltz was over she passed through the ballroom and into the conservatory beyond. She wanted to be alone. She felt that she could not dance again tonight; that she could not endure the touch of another's arm now that his had once again been clasped around her.

But she was not to be left alone. A hand was presently laid upon her shoulder and a low voice sounded in her ear, and on looking up she met the gaze of Leslie Darrell's false but handsome face as it bent above her.

"You here!" she exclaimed. "I wonder that you dared to come! I—how—who—"

"Who invited me, you would like to know," he said, smiling at her confusion.

"That is just what I would like to know. It was a cruel thing to do, whoever did it, considering the circumstances. Old Mr. Armytage invited you, of course; he is half crazy."

"Well, you see it is this way. I did the old fellow a good turn"—and a slow, mocking smile overspread his face—"and, naturally, he appreciates it very much. As for Lawrence—well, you see I am related to the old man, and if the young dog does not comply with the old man's wishes in everything, at least in all important things, he will be disinherited and I will step into his shoes. Understand?"

"I understand that you are a miserable coward. Go back to the ballroom and leave me alone!"

"Then you dill it cowardly to try to win that which one desires very much?"

"Why? Did you ever know one to win anything by a cowardly act, least of all a woman's heart? But what are you doing?" And rising to her feet she snatched from his hand her card which he had taken and on which he had begun to write his name. "I will not dance with you, Leslie Darrell, and you know it!"

"Why not, pray?"

"Because I hate you! Leave me at once, go!"

Lawrence Armytage chanced to enter the conservatory at this moment, and on hearing Ruby's words he stepped between them. "Go," he repeated. "Before I throw your worthless form through the window. My dead old father's misplaced sense of—hospitality has made it possible for you to be here, but that does not mean that I must stand calmly by and see you insult my guests with your odious attentions. Leave the room, this girl excepted."

"You love," Leslie interrupted, with a mocking laugh. "I suppose that if it was your wife with whom I wanted to dance you would offer no objections."

Lawrence did not reply to this, but turning to Ruby he said:

"If that miserable hound ever annoys you again, I will kill him!"

Then he turned to leave them, but these words fell distinctly on his ears; and he registered within his mind a vow that he would be revenged on Lawrence Armytage for the humiliation he had twice suffered at his hands in the presence of Ruby Gordon. And he at once began to lay his plans which were successfully carried out in after years.

Ruby was trembling nervously, and as Lawrence placed for her a chair she seated herself within it and raised her hands to her brow with a weary gesture. Presently with a sudden uplifting of her eyes she said:

"Your wife, Lawrence! It is just possible that he will seek to dance with her. You ought not to allow him that privilege. Go! Prevent it if you can."

Lawrence smiled guiltily. "I had forgotten her," he said, and there was a tone of self-reproach in his voice that, although it wrung Ruby's heart with an odd sense of pain, made her love him the more for it. He should not have his wife to look after her; he must not.

Lawrence opened the ballroom just in time to see Darrell bowing to his wife, and, divining at once that he was asking for the pleasure of a dance, he advanced rapidly to her side, and without seeming to see Darrell in the least, he calmly drew her hand within his arm and led her away, saying as he did so:

"Bessie, this is our dance, I believe."

Bessie raised her eyes to his with a wondering look.

"I think you are mistaken, Lawrence; indeed, I think I am engaged for this dance to Mr. Van Alstyne. Yes; here he comes. He came near losing you, I fancy," she said, as Van Alstyne joined them. "Lawrence was just leading me to the floor in spite of myself."

Lawrence laughed.

"I think that I shall, even now, ask you to excuse her, Van Alstyne, as I particularly desire that she should give this dance to me."

Bessie was delighted. Aside from the pleasure that it gave her to dance with Lawrence, it pleased her that this evident great desire to act she should dance this particular dance with him was witnessed by others.

"You may have the next dance, Mr. Van Alstyne," she said sweetly, "if you excuse me from this." Then, as Van Alstyne consented, they joined the dancers, and as Lawrence bent his head and gazed into the sweet face so near his own, he was struck by the expression of intense happiness that shone from her eyes. He led her to a seat after the dance was over, and the expression of love and joy deepened until she was entirely beautiful, as, bending close to her, he said, in an earnest, entreating way: "Do not dance with Leslie Darrell, little wife. I dislike him very much."

Leslie Darrell stood quite still after Lawrence had taken possession of Bessie and had led her from his presence; while the evil look on his handsome face gradually deepened until he looked almost hideous. He ground his teeth in silent rage and to himself repeated his vows of revenge.

"Of what are you thinking, Mr. Darrell? You look as if you were in pain."

These words, uttered in a light, gay voice, broke in upon his musings, and, turning, he encountered the laughing eyes of Maud Sylvester fixed upon him.

"I feel like a bear!" he answered, a little suddenly. Then, forcing a smile to the lips that had been drawn into a snarl, he gave but a moment before, and changing his tone to one of playfulness, he added: "Just like hugging some one. Who is the pretty girl in blue who has just been dancing with Mr. Alstyne?"

Maud laughed.

"She it is whom you would like to hug, I suppose. She is Mrs. Armytage's sister, Miss Vincent, from Indiana. Shall I present you?"

"Certainly," and immediately Leslie Darrell's countenance became serene. He would, for the evening, monopolize this girl—he would devote his whole soul to show Ruby Gordon that he could win bright smiles from lips as fair as hers if he chose to do so. And Ruby Gordon, he would scarcely dare to interfere with him here; and then the evil possessed the mind of this beautiful sister-in-law against him without giving her some reason for his dislike, and he would never do that. He should triumph over Lawrence in this. Besides, if he could win the heart and the love of the girl, it would make it easier for him to carry out the plans which he had laid for future vengeance.

Thus he had Addie Vincent met her fate. Leslie Darrell was an exceedingly handsome man and he could make himself very agreeable when he chose to do so. And this sweet, unsuspecting girl, knowing nothing of his true character, gave herself up to the enjoyment of his society and before the evening was over, her heart had passed forever into the keeping of an unprincipled man.

CHAPTER IX.

"Love once, love forever."

It was so warm in Vambrace's rooms that he and Mr. Churchton had adjourned to the veranda opening from them, and sat there smoking and finishing a bottle of champagne without entering upon the subject which lay nearest their hearts. In the distance the thousand lights in the harbor twinkled and danced, like a glorious constellation intended to cheer and encourage humanity. As he looked at them Vambrace thought how like everything else in life they were: dazzling to the sight, and yet many of them but marking the situation of the death-dealing men-of-war.

The breeze of the Orient was wafted over them; the sickly, reeking odor which sapped their strength and changed them from men into weaklings. Even in daytime only alm in life appeared to be that of making the dragging moments pass more rapidly.

Finally Vambrace said in a low tone, his voice trembling in spite of himself:

Mr. Churchton, I asked you to call upon me because I wished to have some confidential conversation with you."

"So I presumed."

"Probably you can make a venture as to the subject," Vambrace said nervously.

Mr. Churchton leaned back in his chair and lighted another cigar.

"I might, but I think I will allow you to tell me so that I will make no mistake." There was a twinkle in his eyes, although Vambrace did not see it.

"You are right, you are right;" the Englishman returned, tapping a spot back and forth.

"Yes, I am waiting to hear it," the elder gentleman continued, puffing away at his cigar.

Squaring his shoulders as though preparing to meet an enemy, Vambrace turned suddenly and confronted his guest, saying in a low, tense voice:

"I love your niece, Mr. Churchton, and want your permission to tell her so."

To the hearty, genial gentleman who had been bred in the freer atmosphere of the newer world, this ceremony appeared a little formal. He would have thought he would never have asked for permission to declare his love, but then he remembered that Vambrace was acting entirely in accordance with the customs of his country, and that but a short time before he had been assailed to defend his honor, so he replied pleasantly:

"We are all Americans, and in our country, you know, we have a great deal to speak bic of deciding that matter for herself. Of course, we may interfere with her marrying a fellow, but we do not prevent his telling her that he loves her."

Vambrace smiled nervously.

"But you see I want to marry her; will you interfere with that?"

A firm, steady hand clasped that of the younger man, and the gentleman who had "Come, sit down, boy. Of course I will not interfere if she loves you, and I rather think she does."

"You really do?"

"Yes, I do, bless her dear little heart."

"This is very kind of you, especially when there is a scandal relative to me floating about."

"Vambrace"—now the kind voice was stern and firm—"I believed you when you said you had never wronged a woman, and from what I see of you I believe you are a gentleman and one who would treat my niece properly. She is a girl who is unlike in any society, and I think you may well be pleased with her. She has been splendidly educated and is a thoroughbred to the backbone."

"I know that—all of it," cried the delighted lover. "But let me tell you of my financial condition," Mr. Churchton listened, although once more he was astonished.

"I am a second and younger son. There are only two of us, Bob—dear old boy!—and me. Bob, of course, will come into the title and property if my uncle does not marry, which is not at all likely. I had my mother's settlements, which brought me in a thousand a year."

"Excuse me," Mr. Churchton broke in, "that is five thousand dollars, I suppose?"

"Exactly, all invested in three per-cents. When I was just twenty-one my mother's uncle, a queer old chap, died without issue and left me nearly rich. I think my annual income is something like fifty thousand a year."

"Dollars or pounds?"

"Why, fifty thousand pounds—two hundred and fifty thousand dollars or thereabouts, I suppose. This is income alone, and does not include a beautiful country estate in Cornwall and a real mansion in Belgravia. Of course this has made a rich man of me. Poor Bob was left far behind."

"I know he is not suffering," Mr. Churchton said quietly.

"No, he is not, and never will be while I can get him to take anything, but half the time he refuses, and the young man sighed deeply.

"Then he is proud?"

"Not exactly that. I tell you, I think you ought to know your boy's story, as you soon enough, God knows, and I dread to mention it. Still, it will make you understand that your children, if I have any, will likely come into the title, for I am afraid he will never marry."

Mr. Churchton looked still more interested. Thoroughly American as he was, he could not resist the attraction of a title, and the thought that his grand-nephew would be some time be an earl of the great English nation was intoxicating, to say the least.

Vambrace continued:

"Bob always has been delicate, taking after my father's side of the house. The Vambrace family is fearfully old. It really do trace back to the Conqueror, and their stock is most distinguished. Until my father's time the male members married into the best of the land, choosing as wives delicate girls from other wornout families, until there was nothing to draw upon. My father was a confirmed rake, and among other things go in my country, married a woman under the age of fifteen, from the middle class. Poor darling mother! She paid dearly for her ambition. Her people forced her to marry my father, and there being but little love lost between them—although she was a good woman to make him happy, I believe she was miserable enough. Bob took nothing from her but his delicacy, otherwise he is Vambrace clear through. When I was born she died, it seemed as though all her energy, strength and clean, honest blood was poured into me, but I look like my father's family."

As he looked at the handsome young face, Mr. Churchton thought that one would have to go far to find any better specimen of England's noble youth.

"Bob was always delicate, and so, though he was two years older than I, we were together in our studies. My father made him the same allowance as I had, and yet he could not keep out of debt, although he never appeared to gain anything from his money.

"Vambrace sighed deeply as he looked out over the harbor, but presently resumed:

"Bob was always extravagant. I was doing fairly well at college, but Bob was so unhappy there that I induced him to go abroad and try and build up. I have never forgiven myself for that accompanying him, but I didn't, and therein lies the story of the wrecked life. Lelia have another bottle of champagne," and laying the end of a cigar ing his order with that quiet ease which sat on him as naturally as his skin.

When he had swallowed a glass or two Vambrace continued:

"About a year went by—— I am not boring you?"

"Of course not; keep right on, my boy," was the hearty answer.

"I was ploughing away, for I took an interest in my studies and the blood of my more aristocratic ancestors was in my veins. I wanted to show that I was something more than a mere man, when one day I received a letter from Bob which made me very uneasy.

"It did not sound like him. Of course, the boy had had some little adventures, but nothing which I could write me anything but loving to distraction a woman, assuring me, however, that it was his duty to his family too well to marry her.

"I ought to have gone to him right then, but I did not, and finished out my year of my class and finish off my career at college. I was a conscientious young fool, and so delayed until July. His last letter had been dated from Rome, but I felt sure that he would be in the hills.

"Why?

"Rome is a furnace during the summer, and very dangerous on account of the malaria fever, hanging in my astonishment when I found he had been living for the past six months in an old palace in the city itself, and that as far as was known he was still there with his companion."

"Did you suspect that?"

"No, I can't say I did, and I resolved I would go over to him if it took every cent of my fortune. But when I reached that mighty palace, where his love and tenderness had surrounded her with everything her heart could wish, I found the bird had flown, and a note awaited me, while my poor brother was lying at death's door, utterly deserted. There was not a single human being there but the temperamental, fever-burned man, who rolled back and forth on his bed, moaning and sobbing for her."

"Where was the woman?"

"She had run away from him, as soon as she found he was ill, with an intimate friend of his," came through clenched teeth.

"Well, of all things!" cried Mr. Churchton indignantly.

"It was six months before Poor Bob was able to get around, and he will never marry. First, on account of his poor health, and again, because of her. He realizes her utter worthlessness, but with him it is 'love once, love forever,' and I believe it is that way with me, too."

"Where is she now?"

"I do not know. Three or four years later I was introduced to a lady who claimed to have come from Australia, and, with plenty of money and unimpeachable credentials, backed by some of the leaders of society, had effected an entrance into the highest set. One glance was enough for me. The following day she disappeared, and as far as I know she has never tried to get into decent society again, at least not English society."

"Why, how did you know her?"

"Her pictures were everywhere in the castle, especially life-size oil. Did I tell you Bob was an artist? They showed me a woman rarely lovely, with midnight hair, clear skin and great blue eyes. She was slim, but exquisitely shaped, and there was a something which he managed to catch in his pictures which I would recognize anywhere. I threatened her with instant exposure, and she had the good sense to throw up the sponge. I made no enquiry then, however," and Vambrace laughed carelessly, not recognizing that even the smallest trifle is an enemy may at some time work direful results.

"What was her name?" Mr. Churchton asked just as carelessly, and Vambrace replied:

"Vida Yesmons was what she called herself to my knowledge. This is all I have to recall, and I hope you will understand," this last unfortunately.

"Of course I will, of course, and the story does you credit, too, my boy—great credit." Mr. Churchton continued, in a more wholesouled way, being delighted with the confidence reposed in him.

"And now, to return to the subject in hand. You love my niece, Churchton, what I can offer my darling. I can give her name, luxury, and a title for her eldest son." Vambrace smiled somewhat faintly, with a certain pride that there was so much he could offer. The old gentleman straightened up as he replied with a pride of his own:

"What I offer my darling and now as the guardian of my darling, I am glad of it, you that she will bring you five million dollars, for I intend that it shall be settled on her and fifty thousand dollars annually, just her income. At least your income, she will inherit at my death a quarter of my own property, and at the last showing just before we sailed, when I drew up my will and set my affairs in order, it was estimated that I was worth—" and here Mr. Churchton beamed.

Vambrace looked astonished, but said quietly:

"You know I would take her without a single cent. In fact, I wish she had nothing—my pure, precious Lilly."

"What?" Mr. Churchton said, sharply.

"Why, what?" Vambrace asked in turn, a little astonished.

"Nothing, nothing, of course. You have asked my permission to marry Lilly?"

"And you have given it."

"Of course—certainly. Well, my boy, I wish you luck," and he arose, and in a hasty, abrupt manner, and left Vambrace's presence looking worried, while the latter wondered to himself, then forgot in the happy future of an unclouded future.

Mr. Churchton made his way to his own apartments, and when he reached them he fell into a chair, groaning aloud, and cried:

"His Lilly, his Lilly! Bless my soul, what will do down at Vincent Abbey, and it is Rose who loves Vambrace." Then his mood took another turn, and he grew very pale.

"Rose loves him, I know; but what if Lilly does, too? Sisters, mothers, and rivals! It will break both their hearts, precious girls. Poor, poor Vin, where will you ever such a pickle? I wish we were away from this land where Americans are laughed at and our young people have a fair fight with Englishmen," and with these thoughts in his brain the distressed gentleman fell into a troubled slumber.

CHAPTER X.

"The day that wears my diadem of hope
When I shall know love's plentitude and scope."

The wooing of a lover is romantic when he is a man of the world, thoroughly versed in all the little tenderness which make of every word a caress, but especially is this true when the surroundings are Oriental and the very air itself seems charged with the perfume of Nature.

The entire party had been out in a steam launch and landed on one of the many beautiful islands in the harbor. That evening, so important a one where there are any daughters, and where the lover and lovers roamed about gathering shells and flowers, Vambrace and Lilia stole aside, and, seating her comfortably on a mossy bank, Vambrace himself at her feet with a gracefulness scarcely to be expected in a man of his height. The girl flushed slightly with the dark, ardent eyes of her lover fixed upon her said lightly, for American girls are adept at flirting:

"Surely this must be the original seat of the Garden of Eden."

"Is it so lovely to your eyes?" Vambrace asked softly, his rich voice surcharged with passion.

"Beyond any words. I try to write home descriptions of the glorious sunsets; the coloring; the strange vegetation; the fine verfruit, and you will laugh, but the delightful chow!" this last with a little laugh intended to break the tenseness of the moment which she felt but could not exactly explain.

"Is there nothing else in all this loveliness for you?" Vambrace asked softly, drawing himself to a position where he could look straight into her eyes.

"Of course, many things," but I am stupid about expressing myself. Rosie writes sheets on sheets and never exhausts herself, but I just feel."

"What do you feel?"

The girlish lips began to quiver under that glance and the mellow voice, but Lilly was brave, so she continued, although she scarcely knew what she was saying:

"As though there could not be a more beautiful place on the face of the earth, and her eyes grew dreamy.

"I, too, feel that, I, too, know that this place has been made into a veritable paradise for me this trip, but I know what has changed that which has been hitherto a rather commonplace English station into the abiding place of a heavenly being, and I also know that no matter where my paradise be located, if that being is there also it will be the same.

The soft eyes were drooped and he could not look into their depths, but he could see the full fingers trembling as they tore to pieces a great crimson rose.

"Can you understand me?" How low and sweet the voice!

"Lilly, dearest one, do you realize that you have made me your captive, body and soul?" Tell me, tell me," and the man leaned forward, a world of entreaty in his eyes, his voice tearing her heart strings.

Lilly raised her own eyes to meet the ardent gaze which spelled devotion, reverence and wildest passion, held in absolute check, and the great tears gathered.

"Lilly, my pure, dulcitate flower!" Vambrace cried, holding out his finely-shaped hands to her.

"No," the girl cried, shrinking back, her face flushing crimson.

"But I love you, and I am hoping with every breath I draw that you love me. Not as I do you, but with that you can give me little love."

Down dropped the flowerlike face into the tiny hands, and a great sob wrecked her slight figure. This was too much for Vambrace to endure, he gathered her to his heart, holding the graceful girl in his arms and tenderly caressing the golden head.

For one delicious moment she lay thus, as she longed madly to do ever so, then she struggled, and the arms dropped away from her. With the saddest expression he had ever seen upon a human face, Lilian looked at him and replied gently:

"I love you, but I dare not return your love."

"Why?" The question was asked simply, and yet as from one having authority.

"Please do not ask me for my reasons, was the quiet answer.

The young man's face flushed a deep crimson, and his eyes grew sullen and dark.

"And yet your uncle believes in me," he said hoarsely.

It was Lillian's turn to blush, and the tears filled her eyes once more as she turned and impulsively held out her hands.

"How could you wrong me so! You ought to know that it is not for any such reason.

"What is it, darling, what is it? Tell me. At least I ought to know what it is that strikes our happiness out of life. Surely I have that much right to your consideration."

"I cannot tell you," Lillian sobbed.

Vambrace rose and began pacing back and forth, as he usually did when perplexed or disturbed.

Each sob which came from Lillian's heart seemed to thrust the knife in the wound, and at last he addressed her once more, halfkneeling beside her, his eyes with a hunted, wistful expression in them, searching her face.

"Lilly, darling, I have hopped and hoped for your love. It is something I long for more than anything else in this world and can hold for me. Mine is not a boy's love. Tell me, my darling, are you afraid that I will not prove steadfast?"

"No, no," came back in quick, jerky sobs.

"Is it because of my race? I am thirty-five, my child—nearly double your age."

"That is not it."

"You believe that I love you, dear one—truly, purely, unselfishly?"

"Of course I do," holding out a little hand which is covered with burning kisses and retained.

"See here, dear, is it because you feel that you are being in your cousin?"

"My cousin?"

"Yes, Mr. Lyndstock."

"Oh, no, poor Vin, of course not," and a watery smile came upon her face. "He is a dear, good boy, but I have always thought of him as my brother. I could not love him."

"Could you love me?" Once more the strong arms encircled her and she was drawn toward the manly breast.

"I could love you very dearly," she replied, "but I cannot. No, please do not touch me. I could love, but I dare not."

"Lilly," Vambrace cried triumphantly, "you do love me, and I will have you, no matter what intervenes. See, I claim you for my own," and before she could realize it he pressed his lips to hers. For a moment, delicious, blissful moment, she forgot everything. She no longer remembered the seventeen years between and Rose lived once more and been everything to one another. The years when they had borne the same children and love blotted from her mind in the mad union of lips; when soul seemed to call soul and the sweet, holy rapture appeared to be her love for the man she recognized was the one in all the universe. Then she tore herself away. Her eyes had fallen upon the crimson petals of the rose she had been pulling to pieces.

"Oh, what have you done!" she cried excitedly.

"Simply shown you my heart and obtained a peep into yours," he cried rapturously, but the rise of his joy was checked as the girl said, with such deep anguish in her voice that he scarcely recognized it:

"There is a reason, Mr. Vambrace, for my not loving you, and I fear it will always stand between us. This much I can tell you now. If it is ever removed, I will tell you myself. If it is not, I will never love any one else."

"Then you do love me?" he asked eagerly.

"So much that there is no physical torture which would so tear and rend me as my having to give you up," and she lifted a strangely altered face to his—one he did not dare to touch.

"I shall never give you up!" he cried wrathfully.

Lilly only shook her head sadly.

"Do you think a man's heart is a flower like that"—pointing to the destroyed rose—"that your fingers can pull to pieces and then trample upon?"

Lilly knelt a step nearer to him. "Why are you unjust to me? Do you not see that it is horrible to thrust your love aside, and that if my reason was not stronger than death itself I would never do it? Please give me that much credit," and she looked at the man with an expression he could not mistake. With a face drawn and worn, Vambrace bent reverently over her little hand and raised cautiously, as he touched it softly with his lips.

"If you cannot remove that reason, you will let me know?"

"Indeed, I will. I am not anxious to ruin our lives," Lilly responded, and then showed perhaps more clearly than ever before the true nature carved in the girl as she said in a lower voice:

"Be careful, I hear the others coming back. Let us walk down to the launch," to which he reluctantly assented.

"My brave girl," but controlled himself so that there was but little trace of the struggle she had just been passing through when they were joined by the others. Alex saying in his usual nervous, jerky way, with a distinctive as a quarter-back:

Exclusive territory. Experience not absolutely necessary. AMERICAN WOOLEN MILLS CO., Dept. K, Washington Boulevard & Union St., Chicago.

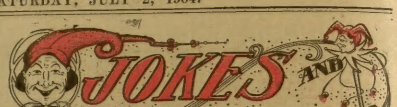
As Explained.

Irate Customer—I thought you said that parrot I bought of you last week was an educated bird.

Dealer—So I did, sir.

Irate Customer—But he can't speak a word.

Dealer—Of course not. He was educated in a deaf and dumb asylum.



Who He Was.

Mr. Lightweight (airily, to conductor)—I wonder what that shabby old codger finds so attractive in this direction. He's been eyeing me for ten minutes.

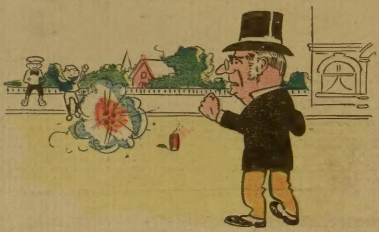
Conductor (thoughtfully)—I guess he's wondering how you happen to be traveling on a pass. He's the president of the road.

False Hopes.

Flannigan—Say, Moike, this won't do. People say you are shwate on Mrs. Flaherty—and she a married woman.

Mike—Phwist! Not a wur-rd. That's only so Oi can go on borryin' terbacky av old Flaherty. He's in hopes Oi'll shoot wid 'er.

THE TOUCH OF NATURE.



Old Fuffkin—It's an outrage the way these infernal boys are allowed to make noises before the Fourth.

"Well, say! They've left a giant cracker. I'll just touch her off for luck."

"Oh, come, now, officer! It's all a mistake. The other boys did it."

A Short Term Empress.

Binks—Oh, she carries herself like an empress, and bosses me around all she likes now; but wait until we are married, and then see how afraid fawn and cringe.

Winks—To you?

Binks—No; to the servant girl.

Modern Improvement.

Friend—You haf move a new house in, I hear.

Swiebler—Yah; und dot house has all de modern imhrovements—city vater for vashing, und a peer saloon close by.

Woman's Wisdom.

Sister—If you are so dreadfully in love with her, why don't you propose to her?

Brother—She gives me no encouragement.

Sister—Nonsense! Only yesterday I heard her advise you to let your mustache grow, because shaving it so much would make it it stiff.

To a Poor Singer.

Some say your voice is good.
There can't be any grounds
For such a thing unless it is Much better than it sounds!

TWO STEPS

The Last One Helps the First.

A sick coffee drinker must take two steps to be rid of his troubles and get strong and well again.

The first is to cut off coffee absolutely.

That removes the destroying element. The next step is to take liquid food (and that is Postum Food Coffee) that has in it the elements nature requires to change the blood corpuscles from pale pink or white to rich red, and good red blood builds good strong and healthy cells in place of the broken-down cells destroyed by coffee. With well-boiled Postum Food Coffee to shift to, both these steps are easy and pleasant. The experience of a Georgian proves how important both are.

"From 1872 to the year 1900 my wife and I had both been afflicted with sick or nervous headache and at times we suffered untold agony. We were coffee drinkers and did not know how to get away from it, for the habit is hard to quit.

"But in 1900 I read of a case similar to ours where Postum Coffee was used in place of the old coffee and a complete cure resulted, so I concluded to get some and try it.

"The result was, after three days' use of Postum in place of the coffee I never had a symptom of the old trouble and in five months I had gained from 145 pounds to 163 pounds.

"My friends asked me almost daily what wrought the change. My answer always is, leaving off coffee and taking Postum in its place.

"We have many friends who have been benefited by Postum.

"As to whether or not I have stated the facts truthfully I refer you to the Bank of Carrollton or any business firm in that city where I have lived for many years and am well known." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

"There's a reason."

Look in each package for the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville."

Quite Another Thing.

She—Is it true that Swellington married a model?

He—He thought he did.

A HALF MILLION ACRES.

A Hard Question.

Philosopher—What is it that you women want.

Mrs. Strongmind—All we want is justice.

Philosopher—Only justice? Then why do you always patronize the photographers who have the best retouchers?

Ladies, Preserve Your Youthful Appearance.

Madame Mignette's Beauty Cream and Skin Food removes every defect, spot, freckle, pimple, blemish or wrinkle, leaving the skin soft, clear and smooth. It is perfectly harmless and will not injure the most delicate skin. It preserves and brings back the youthful glow to the fact and ruddiness to the cheeks, preserving it in this condition until extreme old age. This preparation has been used for years and hundreds are now using it and are more than delighted with the results.

The Worm Turns.

Emancipated Woman (1904)—My dear! Unemancipated Husband (timidly)—Yes'm. Emancipated Woman (sternly)—Your hat bill is perfectly outrageous! The idea of paying three dollars for that bit of shoddy stiffened over a block! If you were not a mere butterfly of fashion, and the very personification of extravagance, you would let your hair grow long and go without a hat, as the football players do.

Not a Pedestrian.

Visiting Relative—You don't walk around the city much, do you?

Boston Hostess—Oh, no. It is a long distance around the city. But I walk about the streets a good deal.

Another Brute.

Wife—Ever so many women are becoming artists.

Husband—Yes, it is a business in which they can talk while they work.

Unspoken Sympathy.

Mrs. Oldboy—You forgot to congratulate the bride, didn't you, John?

Oldboy—No, I didn't forget it. I may be wrong and I hope I am, but I didn't feel as if I could congratulate her without posing as a hypocrite.

Mrs. Oldboy—Why, John! What in the name of common sense do you mean?

Oldboy—She's married to a young man who not only smokes cigarette and parts his hair in the middle, but he also plays a mouth organ.

An Uproarious Bridal.

"What's the row over on the next street?"

"Only a wooden wedding."

"Woofen wedding?"

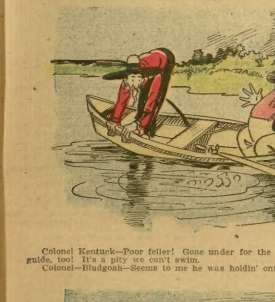
"Yes; a couple of Poles getting married."

Must Keep Moving.

Weary Willie—Hard times, ain't they?

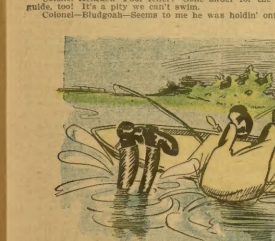
Dusty Rhodes—Yer bet. Keeps a feller hustlin' to keep from workin'.

HAD TO BE DONE.



Colonel Kentuck—Poor feller! Gone under for the last time, and he was a good guide, too! It's a pity we can't swim.

Colonel—Bludgeah—Seems to me he was holdin' onto that jug when he fell in—



(Splash!)

"We just had to save your life, Mr. Tallfish, at any risk, sah."

Little Difference.

Michael Davitt, during his recent visit to America, talked one day to a reporter about the cheerfulness of the Irish character.

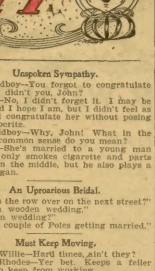
"The very poorest among us don't despond," he said. "No man's condition is so wretched but he can crack a joke about it.

"There was a poor old peat cutter one day whom the parish priest invited to his house to dinner.

"'Come in, Pat,' he said. 'It isn't much of a dinner—only beef, beer and potatoes—but, indeed, you're very welcome to it.'

"'Sure, your reverence,' said the old fellow, his eyes twinkling. 'I'd have you make no apologies about the dinner. It's the same as I'd be getting at home, barrin' the beef and beer.'

Spoiled the Fun.



"Now, Mabel, you mustn't scream like you did when I fired the last one. You made so much noise I couldn't hear the fire-cracker."

His Disability.

The lawyer was examining him concerning his qualifications as a juror.

"Have you ever served on a jury?" he asked.

"No, sir," answered the man. "I've been drawn a good many times, but I was always too smart to get caught on a jury."

"What's that, sir?" interrupted the judge, sternly. "Do you boast of your smartness in escaping jury duty?"

"No, Your Honor," said the man. "Not at all. When I said I was too smart I meant that I was always accused because the lawyers thought I wasn't ignorant enough."

Everything for the Best.

"Yes, sir, I allus have believed Providence does ever'thing for the best!"

"How 'bout that 'ere hurricane?"

"Split the trees to kindlin' wood—stove length."

"Well, how 'bout the airthquake?"

"Swallered the land ten minutes 'fore the sheriff come to levy on it—praise God!"

Needed More Room.

Miss Buyem—I never saw furniture and carpets so cheap. The papers are just crammed with bargains.

Mrs. Buyem—I know it, and there isn't room in the house for another thing.

Miss Buyem—How horrid! I will have to let all those lovely bargains go, or else get married.

A Practical Girl.

He—I know my income is small, but don't your think we could get along?

She—I'm afraid not.

He—You told me that you went to a cooking school.

She—Yes, but they did not teach me how to make wind-pudding.

Not Eagle-Eyed.

Sharpe—I hear that the Baltimore police wear goggles to cover their eyes from the dust.

Wealton—H'm! That's not the only city where the eyes of the police are covered.

Fine Finish.

Gunner—But Russia has some fine warships in the far East. They are armored.

Gayer—Well, it won't be long before they are Japanned.

Worth a Fortune.

"Just to think, giraffes are quoted at $10,000 each."

"Gracious! They must be the J. P. Morgans of the quadruped family."

THE SODA WATER GIRL.

The shades of night were falling fast
When to the soda fountain passed
A youth who led a damsel nice
And said, while feeling for the price,
"Vanilla."

"Try not the drink," we said to her,
"And you," to him, "don't you know, sir,
That microbes linger in the straw?"
He answered us in accents gruff.
"Chestnuts!"

Then to the maiden fair we turned:
"O, lady, have you never learned
How typhoid lurks within the fizz?"
She merely smiled and said: "Mine is Chocolate."

Alas, they quaffed the fateful cups
With many smiles and smacks and sups,
And then he turned, with tender eye,
And sighed to her: "Suppose we try Another."

Again we warned them of their fate,
How germs are said to radiate
From syrup jars and ornate spouts,
They said—we could not rouse their doubts—
"Strawbry."

And so they kept the man at work
Until he gave a parting jerk
At all the spigots, then in quaint
Apologetic tones, they: "Ain't
No more left."

They rose and went, still blithe and gay,
And after they had gone away
We looked at all through the soda fount
Intending all the germs to count—
'Twas empty.

SORE TRIALS.

"Here he is at last, boys," chirped the night clerk as the weary-looking janitor stepped blithely into the hotel and asked if he might have his old room at the rear of the top floor. "Though he had forgotten us, or stumbled against some fate in the form of marriage or some such horrible-sounding scheme."

"Hardly marriage," sighed the inventor, as he scrawled his signature on the register in hieroglyphics symbolical of his eccentricity. "I've perpetrated given marriage serious consideration, but have been too busy uncovering secrets of domestic felicity to find time for the ceremony of marriage itself. For instance, boys," he continued, with a wave of the hand which embraced the entire coterie of inmates, "what good would a wife be to me without one of my patent rotary washing machines? Again, how could we expect to find connubial bliss of happiness without a set of my Merry-Be-Sad-Irons? At present I have on the grind plans for an automatic church which will turn out any given quantity of baptismal font at a stated time, and an egg-beater attachment on the side."

"Whatever become of that pneumatic pancake turner you showed us the drawing of during your last visit?" asked the piano tuner. "That looked to me like a good thing for quick-lunch joints, provided it could be regulated to work fast enough."

"That was the trouble; it worked too fast and too hard. I found that in a farm machinery concern and they put it on the market as a buzz saw for tedders. Works good. That's the trouble with me, same trouble all inventors work under; we have a good idea, get it in working order, but never succeed in giving the result a practical application. Often after we've had months of hard thinking, some bald-headed business man with wealth and power to an Rubber bank account buys our idea for a stipend and converts it into real money."

"But you got something out of the invention?" questioned the night clerk. "You surely did not let go of it for a mere stipend for nothing?"

"Not exactly nothing. You see, I was so engrossed with the plot of a combination grinder for hamburger and dispensing that I let the pancake turner go for a song. Ten dollars down and 1 per cent of the net profits in my share, but I have been too busy to collect the royalties."

"Out a system of checking up the sales, of course?" suggested the shoe drummer, who knows all about the difficulties of collecting commissions.

"Not exactly a system, but I guess it's all right. You see, I never could master the intricacies of bookkeeping, and as the manufacturers is an expert at figuring profits, I leave it all to him. I got the $10 all right, though, and invested it at once in materials for a model self-acting cash check will work while you sleep. During the day it can be turned into a carpet sweeper with a towel rack, and ought to be a good seller after it's introduced."

"But will you get anything out of it?" inquired the piano tuner.

"Don't tell yet, but I may realize enough to get me started on a new recipe I've just discovered. It's a splendid shoe polish and equally good for sore throat. I'm going upstairs now to attend to out the exact proportions of gasoline needed for best results. If you'll excuse me, I'll say good-night."

"Good-night!" echoed the assembly, and for the next hour all were lost in wonderment as to why inventors rarely realize on their pet theories.

Cause and Effect.

Wedderly—My dear, you have improved wonderfully in your music since we were married.

Mrs. Wedderly—Why, John, how can you say that when I no longer play or sing?

Wedderly—That's where the improvement comes in.

Ever Notice It.

Simkins—What is the diameter of a silver dollar?

Timkins—Oh, it varies.

Simkins—How's that?

Timkins—It is smaller on pay-day than it is a few days later.

CHAPTER VIII.

HOW IT ENDED.

It was after liberating Ethelyn that Jack Raynor reported to Alberta's prison cell. Her letter was in his pocket, but what did he care for its contents, its revelations, its surprises? If she had loved him what did it matter?

He stood before her now, looking at her quietly, indulgently, a smile on his lips, a yearning in his eyes.

The real Alberta had left him for a life upon the stage, and she would not have returned to him even if he had satisfied her. But Phyllis Dale, the one to whom his girl betrothed had bequeathed him, together with her name and all her belongings—this girl had given him her heart. She felt no unworthiness on account of the deception his betrothed had instigated and influenced her to perpetrate.

He could well understand the temptation that homeless, friendless girl, who had been tempest-tossed on the ocean of life, had undergone, and he knew she was sustained by the strength of the love he received.

"I am glad you have come to me, Jack!" Alberta asked in an unsteady voice. "Or to kill me? You said you would do that, you remember."

"I have come to execute my threat," he answered. "At present I have no definite condition."

Her great, dark eyes questioned him.

"And that condition—what is it?" they asked plainly enough. And he answered her questioning look in words.

"That you marry me," he said.

He was inside her now, his arms about her waist.

"Darling, darling!" he said softly, "we love each other; what matters anything else in all the wide world?"

She looked up at his breast.

"I don't deserve your love, dear. Why do you want me?"

"Because I love you," he said.

"Come," he added, "we will take you to a justice. We will leave this city husband and wife."

"Jack," she began.

"I have obtained your release. There is no further punishment to be meted out to you. Henceforth I shall be your jailor."

"Why did you accomplish it, Jack?"

"By producing the missing girl. You shall hear the particulars all in good time."

"Something else in which she had declared to Robert Grieve that she would never accept the sum of money necessary for setting her at liberty. She had meant that as a promise to the lawyer who was working in her interest. But, after all, as things had turned out, the promise had given her to Grieve, and to him, therefore, she had betrothed her in return.

"I will come with you at once," she said, "if you still want me."

"Come, then," said Jack, smiling down upon her. And she placed her hand trustfully in his.

It was the following day that a party of three drove up to the gates of Dalton House and asked for admittance. James Dalton and Homer Dalton was sitting alone in the parlor of the gloomy mansion when the door was thrown open, not by his manservant, but by Jack Raynor, who was accompanied by a girl, to him, a stranger. Behind him were Ethelyn Cleave and Alberta Lorne.

The old man was looking more aged than ever. He was in a fit of ill-temper, and, seeing a stranger in his house, he sprang up excitedly.

"What means this intrusion?" he fumed. "Who are you, sir?"

"I am the niece who so lately suffered injustice at your hands," said Jack, sternly. "I now restore them to you."

He stepped aside and the two men entered the room and advanced before their uncle.

The face of Homer Dalton went deadly white, then began to turn slowly to a dark, purplish red.

He realized fully now that his secret would not be kept by Ethelyn, who had suffered such an outrage at his hands. His attack upon her would call for punishment now. The public would soon know that his niece had been imprisoned at his instigation, and that she accused him that he would have to suffer for the crime he himself had committed, while Ethelyn might have remained immured behind asylum walls, away from the world and deprived of the blessed privilege of freedom, and all to hide the fact that in his younger days he had committed a crime which merited capital punishment.

He tried to speak when he fully realized what had come upon him; but his tongue would not obey his will. He struggled for breath and grew purple in the face, and his trembling, wrinkled hand went up to his throat.

It all happened in an instant, and as yet no one had spoken after the girls entered the room.

Then, as Ethelyn stepped forward, he gave one gurgling sound that was half a cry, and fell in a writhing heap upon the polished oaken floor.

James heard the fall and at once rushed into the room to his master's aid. Gently he lifted the white head from the floor.

"It is a fit!" he cried excitedly. "Go for a doctor, some of you! You!" he finished pleadingly, looking imploringly at Jack.

"I will go," said Jack, and he went first."

Jack replied. "It is a paralytic stroke, no doubt."

"Yes, he has had them before. He will never get over this one, he is so old."

Jack drew the man to his feet, and then Jack went silently out, leaving the sick man in the arms of his servant.

As soon as possible the doctor came. The two silent watchers left the chamber to the doctor's verdict.

"He is sinking fast," he told them. "He will never regain conscious to the last, but he will never speak again. It is paralysis of the brain. He cannot recover."

Alberta waited to hear no more. She entered the room and knelt by the bed at the side she bent over the old man lying helpless there.

"Uncle, you have played out," she said to him, "and you are beaten by a woman."

The dying man's eyes told that he understood.

"Listen," she continued. "You thought to amuse yourself with two helpless women, whom you believed to be scheming for your money. They were cheating your will, and Robert Grieve will get the bulk of your fortune."

The burning eyes contained an inquiry.

"Ah," she answered, "servants gossip sometimes, and I knew it out of mere curiosity; they are not to blame for telling it—it is my fault. But I got the information, then I made the acquaintance of Robert Grieve, and chose him. You took me to the city yourself to meet him. I fooled you while you were planning to fool both Ethelyn and myself by winning our hopes and then leaving us entirely out of your will. And I would be winning, having you know that you were wanted by a woman, and the thing that you have tried so hard to prevent.

"I have made an impression on Robert Grieve, and have accepted a proposal of marriage from him. So you see a woman has beaten you. You have thought your money, despite your prejudice; and that woman is one of those whom you have thought to tantalize and trick, and then leave to suffer disappointment."

The dying man's eyes flew to the face now, and Alberta went on relentlessly:

"Ethelyn, that I have outwitted you is more satisfaction to me than gaining the money. For, to tell the truth, I shall hand Ethelyn over to Robert Grieve; that will serve the purpose quite as well, and I presume he must have brought us here. He it was who traced Ethelyn to the place where she had been confined, because he wanted to liberate me.

"Your heir is quite an impressionable young man, and I think will be quite content with the change of brides, when he learns that the current of love will run in a new manner, who has money enough of his own to satisfy?"

"I will now bid you good-by, Mr. Dalton. I am not nor never was your niece, and have suffered more from your hatred than you desired to trick me. I read your purpose in the very beginning, and intended you should come out second best."

She made a sweeping bow and replied in answer to what the old man struggled to say:

"Yes, adventuress; I am that, and I have won the game you played with me."

She swept out of the room then, leaving the old man to realize that his wicked life had not brought him triumph in the end.

Was Alberta Lorne his Nemesis? Would he have mumbled a prayer could that paralyzed tongue have given utterance? It is hard to tell, for no sound ever again passed the lips.

As for Alberta, she repented in a measure for her handness to a dying man, and turned in the moment she was outside the door and came back to his bedside.

She bent over him again.

"I am sorry," she said, "for my harshness. Forgive me, and I will do what I can for you. I beg of you to repent and offer from your heart a prayer to an all-merciful God.

"The world shall not know your history. I can manage Ethelyn, and she shall swear has told no one but Jack and me, and we will keep the secret.

"I am not so bad as I seem, and if you had been honest with me I should never have stooped to scheming.

"Close your eyes," she added, "if you hear me, if you approve of what I am willing to do for you."

The wrinkled eyelids drooped over the staring eyes, and the lips moved, but no sound issued from them. Then the eyes unclosed again and there was a beseeching, questioning look in their depths.

What was it? She racked her brain for the answer. What was that question in his eyes.

"I am trying to think," she told him. "I am trying to think what it is you want. is it James you wish to speak of?"

The eyelids closed in answer.

"Ah, yes," she murmured softly, "you do not want James punished for his part in the abduction of Ethelyn. Never fear, he shall not suffer for his faithfulness to you even in that. I will see to it. The truth of that affair shall never be known to the public. You can trust me. Are you content—are you satisfied?"

Again the eyes were closed, and then quickly opened again.

"At that moment the man James entered the room, and throwing himself by the bedside broke forth into lamentations.

"It was a woman's fault, then to last," he cried, "always a woman who brought trouble into his life." The treachery and deceit of a woman was the cause of his downfall in the beginning. And now—now a woman has been the death of him! The fact of Miss Cleave come back again brought on this fatal stroke."

"But that," said Alberta, "was not the fault of Miss Cleave."

"I have just promised your master," she continued, "that it shall not be known how sinful you have been in him in the matter of aiding him in Ethelyn's abduction. He requested me to wish it."

The man reached out and impulsively grasped the hand of his master—that cold, lifeless hand—and stroked it gently.

She called Ethelyn and called her aside.

"If you want to inherit Homer Dalton's fortune you can do so by doing as I tell you in everything. Will you do so?"

But Ethelyn hesitated.

"I? I am Jack Raynor's wife. It happened this morning. He asked me to marry him at once, but by which I can make you the wife of the heir to the Dalton fortune. It will have been found that I, Alberta Lorne, and I give it to you on one condition. And that is that you consent to keep forever a secret the abduction and every thing connected with it. I have promised Jack Raynor his servant, James Gibson, shall not be exposed, and that the secret of the diary shall never be known. Will you agree to that?"

"Certainly, I have no wish to disgrace James trouble. I brought it all upon myself."

"Then listen." And Alberta unfolded a plan by which she would manage to bring about a meeting between Ethelyn and the lawyer, Robert Grieve, her future wife.

"I have written to him," she explained, "telling him of my marriage, and that I have known my self lose his fancy for me. Hearts can usually be caught on the rebound, and I am sure mine will be easily enough."

And truth to say, Ethelyn did manage it with such dexterity that less than three months later she was the wife of Robert Grieve, and Alberta was left with her lot.

Long before this Homer Dalton had gone to his long account, and Jack Raynor, to his surprise, found himself in possession of a legacy which made him independent for life.

Alberta did not envy the good fortune of her rival, for she had a strong, true heart which had stood by her through everything, and she now had a love which was more than gold.

Together she and Jack returned to their former home, and the truth of Alberta's history was never made known to the torrent of fame real Alberta Lorne. Why should it have been? A sorrow which the brain does not know the heart cannot grieve over.

His Simple Rule.

"The structure of the tooth," says the lecturer on dentistry, "is arranged in remarkable fashion, as has been said, but is not so highly sensitive that it will convey the sensation of pain.

"It is not until we attack the interior layers that we reach the truly sensitive portion of the tooth, and even then it is at times difficult to tell when our instruments have pierced the nerve-center. However, there is one infallible rule."

"And what is that, Professor?" asks a close listener. "How may we tell when we are inflicting pain?"

"The patient jumps."

The Secret of the Crevasse

BY MAUD SOMERVILLE GIBNEY.

CHAPTER I.

DAPHNE'S DISAPPEARANCE.

It was a glorious morning in August, and a crowd of tourists and Alpine climbers were lounging in front of the Riffel Hotel, enjoying the sunshine and the unsurpassable panorama of snow-clad heights and crevasse-furrowed glaciers which stretched in a great sweep from east to west before them. A few more devoted mountaineers had set out hours previously, so that they might perform, at any rate, a portion of their climbs over snow which was still firm and hard from the night's frost. But most were others of a more tender nature, who only meditated smaller excursions, occupying a few hours between breakfast and dinner, and these were busy over their guidebooks, making out their routes, or stowing away their luncheons in ample pockets, fastening more securely the laces of their nailed climbing boots, or hunting for their alpenstocks in the stand by the door.

Among these was a fair-haired, blue-eyed girl, with a complexion that told of healthy, outdoor exercise, tinged by the sun to a faint brown, such a complexion as is rarely seen save on young women who delight in vigorous athletic pursuits. She was clad in a skirt of homespun which was short enough to reveal a pair of well-shaped legs incased in the orthodox fashion, while her open jacket of the same material exposed a flannel shirt with a turn-down collar, set off by a scarlet tie. On her head she wore a broad-brimmed straw hat, bound round with a wisp of dark blue and white spotted silk—colors to match.

Very workmanlike looked Daphne Wyndham as she stood before her aunt, Mrs. Chester, who was seated in a wicker chair with an unopened copy of the London Times on her knee. Mrs. Daphne's wife was a young man of some twenty-eight years of age, almost too swarthy to be considered handsome, with an habitually dreamy, distant look—in his eyes, which spoke of a brain incessantly busy with thoughts far from matters of the moment, yet as the girl turned and looked toward him with his face lit up with a sudden smile, which completely banished the melancholy look which so frequently clouded it, Ralph Cathcart was Daphne's cousin, and more than that, he rather than any one else stood next between them, in spite of the fact, which slanderous tongues not only too eager to make capital of, namely, that Daphne was the owner of large estates in England, which, in the event of her death unmarried, would pass to her cousin.

Daphne, adopted by her uncle and aunt, the Chesters, had been making a prolonged tour in Switzerland, and had reached the Riffel Hotel on the urgent business recalled Mr. Chester to London, and the two ladies were left under the charge of a cavalier had not Ralph Cathcart, who had been climbing in the Mont Blanc district, altered his plans and come to their rescue.

"Well, my dears, Mrs. Chester was saying, "I can't see anything else to be done and quit stockings over your boots if you go on those rocks. I never can imagine why people want to go tumbling about on ice and snow when there's a good solid ground for them to walk upon more than I can understand."

"You must Daphne to me, Aunt Manie, and she will be all right. We are going no-where near glaciers, you know, and you can watch us if you like, through the telescope."

"My dear boy, you know I never can see clearly through those contrivances. My own eyes are good enough."

"Well, perhaps Captain Ferrers will do the watching for you, you said Daphne turning to an old gentleman sitting in the next chair.

Delighted, my dear, delighted! It will be like old days on board ship again, though we had very little subtlety to disregard affairs then, but held our spy-glasses in our own hands, like men."

"We shall be mind how we behave ourselves, Daphne," said Ralph, laughing.

"Ay, your good behavior will. No yard arms getting locked, nothing of that kind, mind, or I shall have it all down in the log in no time. Come, and sailor roared again at his somewhat heavy wit.

"Now, you go off and enjoy yourselves. But just see if there are any letters for me first: I see the postman coming."

"I go," said Ralph, and he disappeared into the hotel, to return in a few moments with three or four letters for Mrs. Chester, one for Daphne, and one for himself, the contents of which consisted of Bank of England notes, he transferred to a pocket inside his waistcoat, throwing the envelope away.

"Now I think we're ready," he said, as Daphne, having finished reading her epistle, handed it to her aunt.

"Yes, come along, or we shall lose the best part of the day. Good-by, auntie, and you, too, good-by to Captain Ferrers." Daphne led the way down the path which descended to the Gorner Glacier.

It was the intention of the young people to cross this and gain the Schwarze Glacier beyond, where the ruggedness and the crevasses, for Daphne had long wished to see what a crevasse was like, promised better one of those particularly smooth-surfaced ones, like the Mer de Glace, over which any one can cross without the least difficulty.

It was some hours later. Luncheon was over at the hotel, and again the guests who had remained at home for the day were scrutinizing themselves outside. Captain Ferrers had taken possession of the hotel telescope that valuable adjunct to every Swiss caravanserai, and with his eyes glued to it, was watching the movements of Daphne and Ralph on the Schwarze Glacier across the deep valley, and reporting from time to time to Mrs. Chester, who was seated beside him.

"They are getting to the rougher part now," he said, "and seem to be in difficulty over a large block of ice. No! Cathcart has climbed it and has helped your niece up. They're all right again."

"Are they roped?"

"No; I suppose there's no necessity. Cathcart knows what he's about. He's known among the guides as a careful climber, and he's been over this part several times before. They're going on again."

"Well, I call it sheer madness to be walking for taking one's neck in those rough glaciers and sloppy snow mountains, when comfortable trains to carry you to the top has been provided for."

"Ah! They've stopped," said the captain, too engrossed to take notice of the lady's last remark. "They're on a smooth bit of surface now, close to what looks like a big crevasse. He's taking her hand. My God! She's gone, she's gone!"

"Gone! What is it?" cried Mrs. Chester, standing up, and in so doing upsetting the telescope and stand.

"Daphne's gone, I tell you!"

"Gone!" shrieked Mrs. Chester, falling back in a chair.

All rushed forward at the captain's words, and, crowding round in their eager attempt to refix the telescope, only made matters more confusing. Some one in the crowd cried sharply: "Leave it to me! Look to her!"

It seemed hours to those standing round before the telescope was again fixed on a spot on which his gaze had been fixed when the catastrophe occurred.

"I can see no one; no one, Cathcart has vanished and with her!" he exclaimed, in tones fraught with horror.

"Can't you see him anywhere—coming down with assistance? Can't you see help. Let me look."

Every one took, but there's nothing to see. We must get together a rescue party at once," he said, with a determined look which was in strange contrast to his usual one. Mrs. Chester he gently took her hand, saying: "Courage, my dear lady. Don't give way. It may be nothing after all. Trust in Providence, and rely on my doing my best for them."

Mrs. Chester could not answer because of her sobs, only she tried to encourage the hand spoke more deeply than any words could have done.

In a few moments the intelligence was known all over the hotel, and among the guests, and in that short time there was no chance of an engagement. A rescue party was quickly organized, ropes, alpenstocks, ice axes, blankets, stimulants and everything likely to be required. Under the direction, the old captain accompanying it, having first pointed out through the telescope the exact spot where the fall of both Daphne and Ralph.

When it was after a hurried march of two hours, that spot was reached, the intervening distance being filled up with only a ledge some dozen feet down the crevasse. Beside her, and resting on the ledge and supported by his arm, was Daphne, while Ralph had carried, but not another trace of him was to be seen. Those standing at first downward, until it lost itself in a deep blue nothingness, stretched the awful chasm. And when the rescuers had reached them, and time alone, could reveal.

A guide was then lowered to a rope and lowered by his companions to the ledge, it was not many minutes before the still unconscious Daphne was lying on the surface of the glacier, with the afternoon sun lighting up her golden hair. Again a rapid examination showed she had sustained no fracture and no bones more than I can understand."

"You must Daphne to me, Aunt Manie, and she will be all right. We are going nowhere near glaciers, you know, and you can watch us if you like, through the telescope."

"My dear boy, you know I never can see clearly through those contrivances. My own eyes are good enough."

"Well, perhaps Captain Ferrers will do the watching for you, you said Daphne turning to an old gentleman sitting in the next chair.

Delighted, my dear, delighted! It will be like old days on board ship again, though we had very little subtlety to disregard affairs then, but held our spy-glasses in our own hands, like men."

"We shall be mind how we behave ourselves, Daphne," said Ralph, laughing.

CHAPTER XII.

THE INDESTRUCTIBLE "LOON."

It looked as though the whole game must be gone over again, and under conditions less encouraging than before, since their stock of food was now woefully limited and the matches few and far between, while chances of leaving the desert isle appeared more slender than ever.

Still, young blood does not long despond, and our boys began to build up new hopes. It was just as well that they could find more or less comfort in the change of companions. There were now three instead of five, and the chances were Barton would prove a vast improvement over the burly Spaniard adventurer.

If the impulsive Antonio had only waited to see what came of the duel, all might have been well. Teddy was fain to believe the fellow, being treacherous by nature, had always intended running off from them at the first opportunity. He would not give him credit for the ordinary amount of gratitude toward those who had saved his wretched life.

However, it was folly crying over spilt milk, and, making the best of a bad bargain, they rejoiced that the trio, first having concealed the shotgun in the same old place.

Teddy and Maro took up their quarters in the cabin again, just as though they had never been forced out of the same, and thinking to save themselves more or less trouble they invited Bravo to share their shelter, which he immediately proceeded to do, letting his fellows shift for themselves.

Thus, in a measure, the boys had bound the new commander to their fortunes.

He asked a thousand questions, it seemed, and would not think of trying to sleep until he had learned just how they chanced to come here on this lonely key, in company with that desperate lot of good-for-nothings under Da Gama, who, Bravo declared, had he only lived in Kidd's time would have been as picturesque a pirate as ever gently put a throat or footed a Spanish galleon.

About midnight quiet settled over the camp, save for the nasal trumpetings of the native who lay stretched outside on the beach, regardless of mosquitoes or sandflies.

Some hours later Teddy, chancing to awaken, and being troubled in his mind, sauntered forth to walk along the beach. Perhaps he had a lingering hope that Antonio might relent and come back to them, but this died away after he had tramped completely around the island without discovering the faintest trace of boat or Portuguese mongrel.

The moon hung high in the blue heavens and made a night long to be remembered. Teddy was filled with regrets that their splendid scheme had been nipped in the bud, for with such a gentle breeze blowing as held forth they might have sailed many miles toward the west, where other islands were supposed to lie.

He had also hoped to discover another turtle, but disappointment awaited him in this particular also, for not a living, moving thing caught his eye on the glistening beach, where the little waves crept gurgling up in wavelets, only to fall back after their ineffectual bombardment of the shore, a warfare that had been going on for countless ages, with little effect.

So Teddy, yawning, crawled into the shelter once more and snuggled down to secure further rest.

It was broad daylight when he came out again.

Already the fellows had replenished the fire, and were wondering where their breakfast was coming from.

Maro set them to work, thinking it wise to begin differently with this lot, and assume the position of leader from the start.

He showed them where fuel could be found, and with a line apiece they began fishing for breakfast.

It is not the most satisfactory occupation in the world, and if the newly devised on the deep choose to act shy, one's stomach is apt to complain.

It happened, however, that one of the men was a skilful fisherman, and could get game if there was half a chance; so that presently he landed a sheepshead that weighed all of three pounds, upon which Bravo pounced and began to prepare for the pan.

This served to brighten things up a bit, as the odor of cookery always appeals to a hungry man and makes him see the silver lining to the clouds.

Bravo over the meal became social, and the boys voted him a vast improvement over the gruff Dago. Maro even washed his cuts and bruises received during his scrap with the giant on the preceding night, and Teddy might as well trouble about his care of, owing to the heat and the prevalence of insect life on the key.

Thus the new deal was started.

Teddy was disconsolate without his pet craft to tinker with, and never came in sight of the ocean without sending a wistful look toward the waters, as though still hopeful that Antonio might think better of it and return.

But the Portuguese evidently knew a good thing when he found it, and was plodding across the sea in the direction of the nearest land, making the little cruiser do her level best, for a sailor will find himself at home on any sort of a floating chip.

After all, their predictions of the preceding evening were wide, as regards the weather, for about noon clouds scurried across the sky, and the wind increased to an ugly blow.

Maro declared he would not be entirely happy if caught out on the open sea in such a cockle-shell as a boat while such a storm was apparently brewing, and becoming philosophical explained to his grieving companion how it might all have been the very best thing in the world that Antonio got away with the Loon, thus removing the temptation from them. It might even be pleasant reminding prisoners on the sand-key, but truly there were worse things than that to be endured, and one of them was a sea-fight between the craft in which one's fortunes had been entrusted, leaving the shadow of a doubt hanging over the rolling billows, the sport of the storm.

They made such preparations as they could against the coming spell of bad weather. Another fishing expedition was instituted, and Maro sharpened around the oyster bed picking up such innocents as might have escaped his last scrutiny.

The others secured an amount of fuel, though this was more difficult to find now that a beach had been almost unanimously since the first landing on the key two weeks previous.

When the deluge descended they were snugly housed, and could afford to smile at this part of the thing; although the presence of the ugly darkey, Hans, was an objectionable element to Teddy, who in his Canadian home had seldom come in contact with negroes.

It howled at quite a lively rate during the evening, and Maro began to worry over Senor Antonio, if so be the slippery Portuguese still navigated the boundless realm of the trifling bit of white shallop on a cedar cruiser. He must be good and frightened, for when all was said and done he had taken in water again, despite Teddy's efforts to keep her bailed almost level with the sea, with her passenger clinging to the mast in desperation.

Yes, there were other things less pleasant than this huddling under the shelter on the stormy island.

Their only secret now consisted of the gun down in the sand, and Teddy, with a bit of palmetto tree, where the rain could hardly reach it to cause rust; and there they intended it should remain for the time as it might be needed to preserve their lives and liberties.

While they sat around, trying to cook something for supper, over which a familiar topic, and this the fashioning of logs into a sort of craft such as the Spaniards had made at parts of the world.

Bravo declared it could be done, if the hatchet only held out, and announced it as his purpose to begin work as soon as the storm was over. This declaration pleased the lads not a little, as it proved the metal of which the Senor Bravo was composed.

It was, therefore, only a matter of time ere they outfitted their shallop for other quarters. Bravo would do it, he was the man to rough-hew the logs into a life-raft that would bear them all up from the midst of the roughest weather.

They liked this style of talk, and backed him up in every way possible, promising assistance as needed.

The storm lasted pretty much all of the next day, though changing its location radically, and was over all by the middle of the afternoon, leaving the sea somewhat calmer than before, though still rough enough to keep the boys from venturing out in their craft.

Being thrown on their own resources is apt to make boys careful, as well as saving, and wherever there was bits of wood on the beach the same were tossed further up on the land, so as to be safe from the next sweep of the tide.

In due time when dried thoroughly it would prove fine in the shape of material with which to boil things and do general cooking. Some coconuts came ashore, possibly being a part of the cargo of a freight steamer bound with the same to some port of the States. These our boys seized upon with eagerness, and were soon engaged in drinking the liquid contents, which tasted simply delicious after the decidedly brackish water of the spring.

There were also several logs of mahogany, washed ashore from the deck of a lumber vessel, and which, despite their value, might be made to do valiant duty in keeping up the fire that must be kept and night in order to save matches.

Then a remarkable thing happened.

Teddy caught hold of his friend's sleeve and pointing ahead made some inarticulate sounds; but Maro did not need assistance in discovering what it was which met his eye.

"Glory, it's the Loon!" he exclaimed, hardly knowing whether he was awake or dreaming.

There the little boat lay on the beach, with the tide making a spack in the tumbling opening showing in her side, so that she could again be sustained by the air-tanks alone.

It was simply amazing, to think of her having been washed back over her course by the storm, and then spewed upon the island just as though the contract called for such a thing. Never in all his experience had Maro heard of such a mirouning happening. Why, it looked as though the demon of the storm recognized the fact that the Loon was the only sea-worthy craft had been deserted on this bit of sand, and therefore had a spack in the tumbling waste of waters, and had taken especial pains to bring the boat back to where it belonged.

Teddy ran up to the relic and handled it with genuine affection, examining it to see how severe the damage had been, and declaring he would repair it again and with even more speed than before, since he had now come through some experience in the business.

And what of Antonio—had he been wrecked?

It looked that way, and there were certain things about the boat that puzzled Teddy. He pointed to a broken painter which he declared had not been there at the time they last saw the Loon, and finally announced it as his opinion that the sloop had been anchored in the storm, possibly the crew forced Antonio to come aboard of her, and then slipping the cable the cruiser was towed behind until in the storm the painter had parted.

CHAPTER XIII.

A GIFT OF THE STORM.

After all, the fact which caused most astonishment and pleasure was the return of the wonderful little craft after another exciting experience upon the tempestuous sea.

At first Maro, Bravo and Teddy had nothing with pleasure.

The Loon was badly in need of further repairs, which I'll be only too glad to give, and then she would be worth possessing, now that I've got the Loon back over her course," declared Teddy, rubbing his hand affectionately along the gunwale of his pet.

"It seems as though we were fated to owe our escape to your boat, and it's useless trying to avoid destiny; but so long as we manage to get off this miserable dot in the sea I for one care mighty little how it's done. So I say, doubly welcome to the Loon, and may she be the first craft to nose above the briny deep. Why, I guess there'll be a procession as one of these wild birds she's named after."

They hauled the boat to her former anchorage, which act no doubt quite satisfied the cedar craft. The old place under the palmetto could be recognized without any attractions for the wanderer, since in making her second landing she had come within biscuit-toss of the location.

So eager was Teddy to get to work that he would allow nothing to delay him, but hunting up material began once more the task of repairing the damage.

As he had said, experience would enable him to work with more rapidity, and possibly a couple of days might see the job completed.

Maro felt as though he had a weight taken from his shoulders, and could turn his attention to the task of procuring food with a light heart.

Nor was this all that the storm brought them.

During the morning there washed up on the sand a box that apparently must have come from some wrecked vessel, and which aroused their liveliest anticipations until opened, when to their great delight it was found to contain packages of rice done up in paper—that is, it had once been so, but the whole contents of the case now presented a sad jumble, having been soaked thoroughly in the water.

Maro set to work trying to save a portion of the goods, spreading the rice out to dry in the sun, after thoroughly washing the grain in fresh water; and the result was fairly satisfactory, though in the cooking of the same they never had to bother adding any seasoning.

It is wonderful what strange legacies that whimsical old sea sometimes bestows upon those favored by fortune.

This was a red-letter day all around, it appeared.

The finny denizens of the deep were ready to lend their aid to making it a memorable occasion, for they showed a ravenous appetite, and, as Maro declared, were looking for the pan, insomuch as to even snap at an almost bare hook.

So Bravo and his companions began to believe the island was not as bad a place upon which to be stranded, after all, and save for the loss of the sloop, together with the disappointment connected with their unsuccessful treasure-seeking, they had little reason to grovel.

Maro conceived an aversion toward the negro from the start.

Perhaps it was the fellow's repulsive face and figure, for that he certainly was no beauty and might have passed for an ogre in the Hottentot regions in any minstrel show. Then also he had a habit of "darting" with his big ox-eyes, as though filled with envy, and a desire to appropriate everything in sight, so that taken altogether he was hardly the kind to impress one favorably.

Perhaps in the long run Maro might learn something to his advantage, and that it does not always pay to judge a book by its outward appearances alone.

As evening drew near, the New England boy liked to seat himself in a favorite nook and look out across the sea. It might be noticed that his eyes always turned toward the north, showing that his thoughts were with the parents he had left home for, where he had spent most of the years of his young life, and also with a certain pair of dear friends.

Then, Teddy, he was of a more buoyant nature, and took to rousing as a duck does to water, so that no longings of this sort ever troubled him. Besides, he had called him "his oyster," as he was pleased to express it, and the boys understood that he intended to open as the humor seized him; so that it mattered little what part of the globe he found himself temporarily stranded on, he would always be strange things to be seen or done by Teddy Gray.

From his reflections Maro was aroused by the chattering monologue of his friend, who, utilizing a tin-pan and a big spoon in lieu of a gong, and for which purpose it answered admirably.

The sun had disappeared, and already the afterglow was giving promise of a fine day, for there is little twilight in the Caribbean region, that being an attribute of more northerly quarters.

And looking toward the camp Maro was bound to confess that it did have a certain picturesque appearance, which would no doubt have been greatly lacking in interest when he found himself confined within the walls of a prison cell, or dungeon, as it might be, in some house work converted with an office, for he was much inclined to romance in his nature, and when he pondered merrily and lighted up the figures of the adventurers with the glow of fire, or a black gnome straight from the land of fancy.

Then the appetizing odor of fried fish was wafted his way, exciting his desire for food. And then, too, there was something about him to snuff the air, an indescribable smell that, for the life of him, he could not place, but which he could not understand.

Maro had been making some experimenting, had tried to copy after some of the fine-tangled substitutes for the pepper-berry, and roasted some of the fish until it was half burned, when he succeeded in mashing the berries between two stones, and something like pepper was the result. The boy-resulting from this touch of genius was muddy and extremely villainous, but, stuffed with what were, with Hobson's choice confronting them, delicacies, that the shipwrecked deserved their thanks for extracting from the same a certain degree of appreciation.

Maro fellows are determined to look on the bright side of everything. It is astonishing how little it takes to make them laugh, and their merriment over that supper of fried fish was immense.

Bravo told how his folks often made a beverage of the roasted berry of his part, first browned in the oven and then ground. He declared he had learned how to like this concoction during the time he was cast away on an unknown article in the entire South-land, and was certainly a queer character, and he rattled off many of his experiences with the Portuguese sailors from Nova Scotia down to Key West.

Many of his adventures were humorous, and afforded our lads a hearty laugh, while others bordered on the mysterious, Bravo being, as it were, a believer in the supernatural.

Of late he had widened his range and taken to sailing the big sea to the south, bent on making a fortune in the treasure-trove of which he had heard so much; so that by degrees he was becoming a regular crack in all the line. Once the fever gets into a man's veins, it unfits him for all else.

Teddy showed a trifle of uneasiness at times, and his companion wondered what was worrying him; so while they sat together that evening, watching the stars that studded the azure sky, he demanded that the Canadian confide in him.

Perhaps he had an indefinite suspicion that Teddy, too, disliked the black, and suspected him of treachery.

To his surprise it was no such thing, and he found himself able to laugh at the fears expressed, they seemed so shadowy and without any foundation to him.

Teddy declared their island seemed to have a peculiar attraction, a sort of magnetic power to bring all things that way. They had in the first place been thrown upon its hospitable shores, then came the spongers' vessel with Da Gama and his men, after which the sloop in search of gold showed up, and now last but far from least, their wonderful little cruiser had returned after a voyage of many miles.

The being the case, Teddy found himself wondering whether sooner or later Da Gama and his rough followers might not drift back also, since it seemed next to impossible for anything to get away for good.

Of course Maro soon laughed the idea to scorn, declaring that it was beyond all reason, and the chances were they might never set eyes on that crowd again.

Although they had known each other only a few weeks, it seemed to the boys as though they must have always been acquainted, and no matter what the future had in store, it was certain that they would see much of each other from time to time.

That night was a peaceful one.

The wind only blew gently and the waves lapped the shore. Quite in contrast to the previous one when the storm-king reigned, and it was difficult to sleep at all, what with the noises without, and the crowded condition of the shelter.

Another day.

So ambitious was Teddy that, at peep of dawn, he stirred himself, and leaving Haro to cook breakfast, which he seemed capable of doing after his kind, the boy started to work on his boat, which had the greatest possible fascination for him.

Maro was bent on exploring a certain reef

It was a shark,

which he had reason to believe might harbor a brood of fat bivalves. He had made a rude raft from several spars, which he paddled about on, there being little difficulty in getting around so long as the sea was fairly calm and the wind kept quiet.

A grind about situated some sort of a discovery, and presently Teddy saw him working away like a Trojan endeavoring to spear the trophies he could see down some six feet or so below the surface.

It proved slow work, without some sort of implement, and so coming ashore Maro proceeded to manufacture the apparatus needed to encompass a general capture of the shell-fish.

This consumed pretty much all the morning, but it was worth while, for when he fairly got to work they had a royal feast spread before them.

He had come ashore with two loads, and, not satisfied, since the conditions might not be so favorable another day, had gone out again to rake up a third.

While busily engaged in his labor he felt something strike his little float a severe blow. Looking he came near losing control into the water, and only recovered himself by an effort.

Filled with wonder and consternation he looked around, but nothing was in sight either on the sea or in the air, to which the shock could be ascribed.

A movement beneath the surface drew his attention, and to his surprise as well as horror he looked into wicked eyes that seemed to glow with a fiendish desire to do him evil.

Of course it was a shark, a monstrous fellow of the man-eating species, and Maro was always ready to declare it was his full belief the rascal had taken advantage of his occupation and bumped into the raft, with the intention of dumping him over, when he would be an easy mark for those cruel teeth that gleamed in such white and serried rows between those strong jaws.

CHAPTER XIV.

GOOD-BY TO DICKENS ISLAND.

Filled with indignation at having been made the victim of such a ruse, Maro thrust his paddle at the big shark, intending to prod him in the eye as a gentle hint to mind his own business and not come prowling around where he was not wanted.

But his utter astonishment at the end of the paddle was seized between the jaws of the fish, and if he had not hastily let go he must have taken a plunge overboard.

This was beginning to look serious indeed. Why, that miserable old shark must mean business, and had made up his mind to dine upon tender young New England hams.

Maro's shout attracted the attention of Teddy, who came running to the edge of the water to ascertain what was up.

When he learned the facts he saw that it was apt to prove a bad business, should the shark be cunning enough to upset the little raft by energetic means.

"Keep as still as you can, and don't excite him any more!" he called out, running off.

Presently Maro came back with the gun in his hands.

The others had also heard the noise, and were on the run for the scene, wondering what had happened.

Teddy called to them, and pointed to the Loon.

Apparently his repairs had reached a stage that admitted of the boat being launched, and this was just what he wished the men to set about doing.

Maro had enough to do taking care of himself, for the ravenous fish was butting hard against the raft, as though bent on destroying the buoy that seemed to keep his intended prey away from his teeth; and each time his head came in contact with the light spars there was a shock that staggered the lad crouching there in alarm.

Surely, Maro could be excused for feeling something akin to genuine terror as he contemplated those rows of glistening teeth so anxious to tear him limb from limb.

What made it worse was his utter helplessness. Could he have only had some means of fighting this persistent enemy, he would have felt better able to stand the situation. As it was, all he could do was to cling there and pray that Teddy would not arrive too late.

The raft had not been made to withstand such rude assaults, and Maro was afraid that at any minute its fastenings might part, thus hastening the catastrophe.

Teddy had leaped into the cedar boat, which was followed him with a pole, intending to act the part of propeller.

They were coming with the utmost speed, and yet to Maro it seemed as though the boat scarcely moved, such was the state of his nerves.

Fortune was good to the imperiled lad, however, and despite the repeated shocks from the piratical fish the raft still held together until the others came upon the scene.

Teddy had inserted a couple of buckshot shells in the gun, some of which he always made it a practice to carry on his various expeditions, and which had been preserved along with the other ammunition.

The shark turned upon the new disturber of its peace, and rose as if to snatch a bite out of the modest cruiser's larboard streak.

This was just the opportunity Teddy craved, and he sent a double load downward, firing one barrel imediately after the other.

Meanwhile, Maro had succeeded in clambering into the boat, which was headed for the shore in a great hurry.

Teddy knew he had given the monster something to worry him, and the commotion in the water seemed to bear out his assertion.

Maro thought now he had quite enough oysters for one day. Somehow his ideas seemed to have changed radically, showing how circumstances alter cases.

Later on the raft washed ashore, and an examination showed the plain marks of the shark's teeth in the spars of soft pine.

But the accident did not prevent them from thoroughly enjoying the grand feast of oysters in various ways, as that Teddy, assisted by his black aid, placed before them for dinner.

Maro thought them well earned.

He dreamed about that same shark, and sat up in the middle of the night reaching for an oar with which to stash the audacious swimmer, only to hear Teddy's laugh, and finding that he was clutching desperately at that young man's socks.

And it needed him considerable satisfaction, after the scare he had received, upon sauntering out at break of day, to discover some bulky object cast upon the shore, in which he was quick to recognize his enemy of the preceding day.

Teddy had reason to feel proud of his marksmanship, for his lead had done fearful execution about the monster's head, despite the fact he so of water through which the buckshot had to pass.

He was an object lesson, lying there on the sand, and Maro thought better of the fellow dead than alive.

The boat was ready for service, and all that remained was to settle as to their leaving the key.

Five would crowd it somewhat, but since the ballast of stores and the weight would not prove too much, if only they could avoid getting in one another's way.

Food was what worried them most of all, since the supply had been hastily constructed, save as they drew upon their larder, the sea.

All the oysters they could carry were put aboard.

These would keep for days, and save them from actual starvation in case of necessity.

Besides, it was determined to cook what fish they were able, and this would also keep for a time after being boiled.

Fresh water was another source of trouble.

All the canisters were filled, so that they could count on a supply that would last a couple of days, if they were careful.

In this warm country one becomes very thirsty, and there is no water like the brackish tendency of the water, while the very knowledge of a scarcity adds to one's thirst.

That night was a busy one at the camp.

They expected it to be the last on the key. For better or worse it was their intention to cut loose on the morrow, unless from the signs they had reason to believe another storm might be brewing.

It seemed hopeless to look for the coming of assistance, since the wash had crept by and only one sail had been sighted.

The boys had enjoyed the experience in many ways, but all the same time they would be delighted to see the lone island vanish in the distance. Such bracing young spirits cannot long be satisfied to content themselves within such narrow borders. The world is too large and full possesses too many attractions.

Another week went slept well.

Three separate times did Teddy, with the cruiser's customary anxiety, creep out of the shelter in order to survey the starry heavens and see what the signs of promise were.

And on the last occasion he found Maro standing there on the open deck with face looking an observation.

But the night came to an end, as all things earthly must.

Morning broke with a prospect for a hot day, but as long as this did not bring up a storm they cared little.

"The breeze is favorable," announced Teddy, as soon as he had appeared on the scene.

It had come up early, and was already dimpling the water in a coquettish way, heading out of the south-by-east.

"Yes, and we'll have all we want before the day is over, if I'm a Dutch sailor," remarked Maro.

Brave was called upon for an opinion, and expressed himself to the effect that if it didn't storm they would probably have a fine day, which was about all he would commit himself to.

So the last meal on the famous sand-key was soon under way.

No more would the smoke of a camp-fire float seaward from this lone islet in the midst of the great Caribbean, which had been anchored near the scene of Maro's adventure so many years before; and all their last reminder of their Crusoe life was cast adrift.

Then the wind caught their sail, and they began to glide through the quiet water inside the reef at a fine rate.

Outside it would be rougher, though not dangerous, as they were far away at that experience when the wind came up in force, and the sloop could ride anywhere.

They looked back to the little sand-key with more or less emotion.

The smoke of their fire still drifted lazily over the spit at the extreme end of the island, and seemed to be waving a last reproaching Teddy for his base desertion; but he threw all cares aside with his usual jolly good nature trolled a ditty suited to the occasion.

CHAPTER XV.

VOYAGERS OF THE CARIBBEAN.

Well, they were off at last.

Before them stretched the vast and mysterious sea, over which so many pioneer navies of the world had from time to time sailed in search of fame and fortune, to include much that was interesting connected with the rise of the United States to a world power.

All those aboard the small boat thought about was getting back to the mainland, where they might find others of their kind, and be able to secure a ship to take them to Jamaica, or any place in touch with the world.

Why, to hear those two lads talk you would imagine they must certainly have been marooned for a period of many years of a few brief weeks. They speculated as to what wonderful changes had come about in the civilized world, and whether either of the great nations which they represented had gone to war.

There was a sort of delightful uncertainty about these boys having been cut off for a length of time; for like all young fellows of the present day they had become accustomed to the every day act that had transpired around the world during the preceding few years.

The boat justified all the praise which her proud master had bestowed upon her, for she certainly glided through the water like a veritable witch, and could, if necessary, beat up against the wind a point or two that quite took Maro's sailor heart by storm; for having spent his life mostly upon the seaport he knew little or nothing of these elegant little tricks which boat builders along the St. Lawrence fashion for those who delight to knock around in lakes or coast lagoons, consider necessary to know, and able to navigate wide sound or narrow creek as the wind blows.

They ran before the wind during the whole morning.

Maro had his glass, and tried to see how long he could distinguish any sign of the little sand-key; but it disappeared as it passed beyond range of his vision.

"That ends it," remarked Teddy, when he learned that Dickens Island had faded completely from view.

"Oh, I don't know," said Maro, with a malicious grin; "because, you remember everything comes to an end at last, and after we've sailed in a circle for a day or two, perhaps——"

"Drop it, old fellow," interrupted Teddy, hastily. "Even the best of prophets is liable to make a mistake some time or other. We will try to keep away and resist the supernatural attraction by having our noses pointed toward the west."

Thus far the wind had been favorable, and they believed they must have covered fully twenty miles since starting out.

Many an anxious glance began to be cast heavenward, for well they knew how treacherous these seas were, especially in such prises, and while they hoped for a continuance of smiling skies, at the same time they wished to be ready for trouble should it crop up.

Strange that they did not even sight a sail in any quarter.

Brave said again and again that it was very mysterious, and he appeared to suspect there might be a hoodoo aboard, though he gave no hint as to whom he believed merited such an evil title.

The breeze died completely out, so that the boat did not even a ripple on the surface of the sea.

That was bad enough, seeing that it meant delay, and with a short stock of food on hand this would be apt to hit them hard; but that was not everything.

"Yonder are clouds peeping over the horizon," announced Teddy, who, being a fresh-water navigator, was unusually nervous concerning the ugly humors of the sea; though he had surely shown the right spirit at the time he found himself swept through the inlet and out upon the tumultuous bosom of the stormy Atlantic.

By carefully watching it would perhaps lessen these feelings of anxiety with regard to the possibilities of the ocean, though it could never bring contempt. The man who pretends to hold the mighty deep lightly is a deceiver through and through, for in its disturbed mood the ocean may well command respect from the boldest soul.

None of them felt very joyous over the appearance of the dense masses of vapor low down on the horizon. Hot as the sun seemed, they would willingly have borne a little extra discomfort for the sake of, in exchange for, the chances of a squall.

Twice had the diminutive craft defied the storm-king to do his worst, and the third time might finish the work.

Brave idly pulled at the oars, moving the boat gently to the direction where their goal must lie, and Maro, more out of nervous nervous action on his part than any design to accomplish anything.

They were helpless to avoid whatever was coming, and must simply stand up against the rush of wind and water, hoping for the best.

Well, it was a false alarm, for soon the clouds were covered by heavens the rain came down in a deluge, so that the voyagers found it necessary to bail out the craft in order to keep from being fairly swamped; but not a breeze had accompanied the downpour.

They could hardly believe their eyes, and impulsive Teddy, soaked to the skin as he was, fairly shouted his appreciation.

They were able to replenish the store of fresh water, as a result of the flood, and that lessened their fears for the present. It really added to their comfort.

And when the sun broke forth again a most delightful breeze sprang into existence, wafting them on their course, though it now came out of the east, and they were forced to their running close-hauled.

With the wind behind them they became merry once more, and before the westering sun sank low enough to dazzle his vision Teddy took a long and earnest observation with his glass, in the hope that somewhere in the distance he might make up a glimpse of land.

But it was not so ordained.

They were fated to pass through other experiences ere reaching the limit of their eventful cruise.

That last hour of the blazing sun was very unpleasant, for the old fellow put in his best licks to torture their flesh, after which they were quite ready to heave a sigh of genuine relief when he condescended to go down out of sight behind the gold the temples and kiosks of heathen China.

With the coming of evening the wind also sank temporarily to rest, as usual, and a delightful calm fell upon them.

How delightfully cool it became, once dark, stretching out on the deck, and away to other fields! They stretched themselves, and the boat was allowed to drift as it liked, leaving their companions to keep a keen lookout for the dorsal fin of a shark; for the latter's presence on the scene key both of them had entertained new respect for the pitiless monsters of the deep waters, and had no idea of furnishing a meal for so hungry a customer.

The sight o'clock the breeze saw fit to start into life again, and coming out of a quarter more to the south than before, so that the little cruiser was pushed right along.

They were being driven away to be forgotten.

The crowded condition of the boat prevented such comfort as might have followed had there been but two passengers instead of five.

It was a hard bed upon which they cast themselves, and the extreme heat previously caused them to ignore this fact. Teddy had made all needful arrangements for comfort in planning a long cruise, and was accustomed, when sleeping in the Loon, to blow up and use his pneumatic mattress, which he bunked aboard; but during the wreck this arrangement had gone adrift with the sloop, and at any rate his condition at the time, with the cruiser half under water, would have rendered the use of such luxuries impossible.

Beggars have no right to be choosers, and this fact made it much easier home to those who sail small craft with limited accommodations.

They took turns at keeping watch, so that one always held the tiller while the others slept.

For want of a better compass they guided their course by the evenly luminaries that shone overhead. It was easy to pick out the Polar star, and one of the bright planets happened to lie exactly in the quarter whence the little craft was headed.

When it came time for them to steer he pulled his cost around him, as it had come on quite cool about midnight, and settled down to a long siege of it.

The wind still held out, and the cedar boat went merrily through the heaving sea, the water gurgling along her sides in a fashion to please the heart of one who delighted in cruising under any and all conditions.

He had spent many days and nights in that same tiny vessel, but none of his former experiences could compare with the present.

That glowing heavenly body flamed in the western sky, and guided him straight on. How could he do otherwise than think how these old-time worthies, the Wise Men of the East, were led by such a faithful finger-post.

Naturally, they were very eager for dawn to come, hoping that the day might disclose signs of land ahead.

Disappointment awaited them, however, for the same monotonous line that marked the watery horizon stretched away in every direction.

Neither of the boys said anything, but Brave relieved himself of a choice variety of expressions concerning their miserable luck, and again gave a wonder mind concerning his belief in the Jonah theory.

Maro, accustomed to reading character, believed they would be apt to have trouble with the coast mariner, if things did not improve before a great while.

He kept the gun near him, and was grimly resolved to use it if the occasion demanded heroic treatment.

Of course they had not arrived at the parting of the ways yet, and he sincerely hoped there would be no occasion to resort to such stern measures.

Their breakfast was eaten in melancholy silence.

Every one seemed to be wrapped up in his own thoughts.

The food was divided with impartiality, as was right; but Teddy imagined he saw the greedy eyes of the black rest longingly on the share that was passed to the young Crusoe; and this circumstance caused more of those suspicions to creep into his mind than ever.

He had read about all manner of terrible things done by mutineers at such descendants of the cannibals dwelling in the heart of Africa, when face to face with dire necessity—how they had even resorted to the horrible practices of their ancestors; and Teddy was determined that he would stand up for his rights so long as he had breath in his body.

The morning passed.

More breeze than they wanted swooped down upon them and made things fairly hum. The sea began to rise, and soon were the crests of the big waves and sent flying in the spray that came in showers; while constant vigilance was required in order to keep the boat from being shipping vast quantities of water.

Teddy had had only a tiny bit of sail, and even then their progress was extremely rapid.

Over and anon, when they crested a billow, Teddy would cling with one arm to the mast, and, shading his eyes, look ahead with the glass to his eye and endeavored to make some discovery.

It was not an easy task, so that it may not be wondered at that he failed to discover the land he had hoped to find in the end.

It was a welcome sight to one and all, for surely it must promise that they might be ended. That this could prove to be land that was held in the grasp of one of human habitation, did not seem to occur to them at all, and yet such a thing was possible.

As they were bearing directly down upon the island and would be soon upon the breakers unless great care was taken,

Bravo, as the most experienced sailor on board, took the tiller.

Their only safe plan would consist in making a sweep around and coming up to the lee of the land that jutted out like a crooked finger.

Of course they rested in complete ignorance concerning the nature of the sea, and a thousand ragged rocks might be lying in their intended course, ready to tear the frail cedar boat into tatters; but they had no choice, and had to accept the risk.

It was a time of supreme anxiety.

Already the waters around them were boiling like a vast caldron, and at any instant Teddy expected to feel the dreadful quiver that would announce their coming in contact with a reef. When this occurred there would be small chance for any of them to escape through that whirling, churning mass of water.

Bravo held on with the tenacity of his kind, his teeth hard pressed together, his gray eyes burning with the intensity of his emotions, and his lantern jaws set grimly.

Many miles ahead the North Carolinan just then, he represented such bull-dog resolution to conquer or die.

It was a close shave.

Once or twice the boys gave themselves up for lost, for it seemed as though nothing under a miracle could prevent the boat from being smashed against some reef that reared its ugly head beyond; but as though some kind destiny had taken them in charge, they avoided all these perils, and finally began to find smoother water, showing that in some wonderful manner the promontory had been rounded.

Once more had the gallant little boat proved her title as a champion cruiser, and Teddy's heart swelled with pride, as well as thankfulness, for their escape, when he realized that the danger was a thing of the past.

Not until then did they think to even take a glance at the shore which was close by, and where the cocoanuts flaunted their feathery fronds in the strong breeze; and the first observation brought out mingled cries and chagrin from the voyagers, for lo, and behold, they beheld anchored in a bight the little sloop which Da Gama and his men had torn away with when quitting the sandkey.

Next week's Ledger will contain further chapters of this thrilling story of adventure. Cameras and patterns are still being forwarded free to each subscriber. See advertisements on pages thirteen and fifteen.

A Rule That Worked Both Ways.

Two senators had lunch together Saturday in the restaurant at their end of the Capitol. The bill was exactly $1. The senior of the two in point of service drew forth a bank note to pay the score.

"I have been here eighteen years," said he, philosophically, "and that note is about all I have to show for it."

"But," replied the other, known as a facetious senator, "what has the country to show for it?"

FOR YOUTHFUL EYES

THE NAME OF OLD GLORY.

BY JAMES WHITCOMB RILEY.

Old Glory! say, who,
By the ships and the crew,
And the long, blended ranks of the gray and the blue,
Who gave you, Old Glory, the name that you bear
With such pride everywhere
As you cast yourself free through the glorious air
And leap out full length, as we're wanting you to?
Who gave you that name, with the ring of the same
And the honor and fame so becoming to you?
Your stripes stroked in ripple; of white and of red,
With your stars and their glittering best overhead,
By day or by night,
Their delightfulest light
Laughing down from their little square heaven of blue!
Who gave you the name of Old Glory? Say who—
Who gave you the name of Old Glory?
The old bearer lifted, and, faltering then
In vague heps and whispers fell silent again.

Old Glory, speak out! we are asking about
How your happened to get such a name, so to say.
That sounds so familiar and careless and gay,
As we cheer it and shout in our wild, breezy way,
We—the crowd, every man of us, calling you that—
We—Tom, Dick and Harry—each swinging his hat,
And hurraing "Old Glory" like you were our kin.
Whew, Lord! we all know we're as common as sin!
And yet it just seems like you humor us all
And waft us your thanks, as we hail you and fall
Into line, with you over us, waving us on
Where our glorified, sanctified betters have gone,
And this is the reason we're wanting to know
(And we're wanting it so—where our own fathers went we are willing to go.)
Who gave you the name of Old Glory—
O honey—
Who gave you the name of Old Glory?
The old flag unfurled with a billowy thrill
For an instant, then wistfully sighed and was still.

Old Glory, the story we're wanting to hear
Is what the plain facts of your christening were:
For your name—and to hear it,
Repeat it and cheer it, 's a tang to the spirit
As rank as a tear—
And seeing you fly and the boys marching by,
There's a shout in the throat and a blur in the eye
And an aching to live for you always—or die
If, dying, we still keep you waving on high.
And so, by our love
For you, floating above,
And the stars of all wars and the sorrows thereof,
Who gave you the name of Old Glory, and Who
Are we thrilled at the name of Old Glory?
Then the old banner leaped, like a soul in the blast,
And fluttered an audible answer at last—
And it spake, with a shake of its folds as voices, and it said:
By the drums snow-white and the living blood-red
Of my bars, and their heaven of stars overhead;
By the symbol conjoined of them all, sky and sward each;
As I float from the steeple, or flap at the mast,
Or droop o'er the sod where the long grasses lift
My name is as old as the glory of God.
So I name by the name of Old Glory.

Butchers Bad Men.

Small Flossie was looking at a picture book, and finally said: "Mamma, why do men hunt lions and tigers? Isn't it wicked?"

"No, dear," replied the mother. "They are hunted because they kill sheep and poor little lambs."

"Then why don't men hunt the butchers, too?" asked Flossie.

Juvenile Theory.

"Now, boys," said the Sunday school teacher, addressing the primary class, "who can tell me why St. Peter stands at the golden gate?"

"Mebby he's layin' fer the feller what robbed him ter pay Paul," answered a small urchin.

FOURTH OF JULY.

U. C. MIDKIFF.

Ring, ye glad bells, from the steepie and towers!
Speak, ye loud cannon, with thunderous voice!
Spread the glad news through this broad land of ours,
Bid every heart on this day to rejoice!

Known far and wide is its wonderful story
In every land on the face of the earth;
For 'tis the day of America's glory,
The pride of our nation—the day of its birth.

Turn back today through our history's pages,
Search through this record of days fair and bright,
Many are there which in all coming ages
Ever will shine with a radiant light.

But, midst this legion of days brightly beaming,
One makes all others to pale 'neath its rays;
As the fair stars, with their silver light gleaming,
Fade in the light of the monarch of day.

Long years ago, 'midst the turmoil of battle,
The freest of Liberty's children was born;
Its baby-song was the drum's startling rattle,
And thunder of cannon at evening and morn.

Reared in the school of privation and rigor,
Brave, strong and noble our country has grown;
Ever renowned for its progress and vigor—
Grandest of nations the world has e'er known!

Lift up your voices in praise and orations,
Tell of the heroes of freedom on high;
The birthday is here of the greatest of nations,
Shout and rejoice! 'tis the Fourth of July!

Who Made Old Glory?

The first flag of the stars and stripes was made by Betsy Ross over a century and a quarter ago. General Washington is generally given credit for having designed it but doubtless a part of the design at least is the work of Benjamin Franklin. Benjamin Harrison and a Mr. Lynch. These three were appointed a committee in 1776 by the continental congress to create a national flag and they decided upon one with thirteen bars, alternated red and white, to typify the crosses of St. Andrew and St. George in a field of blue. This flag was but little used. It was unfurled Jan. 1, 1776. A few months later (May, 1776) General Washington with Col. George Ross and Robert Morris, called upon Betsy Ross and laid before her the plan for a flag containing thirteen stripes, alternate red and white with a blue field dotted with thirteen stars, and asked her if she could make it. She suggested a five-point star in place of the six-point one in the original plan which suggestion was adopted. This is the flag that Betsy Ross made 130 years ago in her little home at 239 Arch street, Philadelphia. This is Old Glory. Although made in May, 1776, it was not adopted by Congress until June 14, 1777. Betsy Ross sewed only thirteen stars into the flag which was flung to the breeze by the revolutionary patriots, and now there are forty-five, but the stripes will ever remain thirteen, seven red and six white. When the immortal Washington asked the Widow Ross whether she could make the flag, she replied: "I don't know, but I will try." She was a very skilful needlewoman, acquainted with rent and her success with the first American flag not only delighted General Washington but has delighted a rapidly increasing nation ever since. The flag of 1776 is dead and rotted together with a nimble needle has had a progeny that may be counted by the millions, and it has been seen a-flutter on every sea, and is known in every land. So distinctive are the stars and stripes, and so grandly are they identified as human liberty, that one may say without fear of contradiction the American flag is recognized the world over the instant it is seen, and never does it fail to thrill the observer who knows the story of its origin. So rapid has been the march of events since the Stars and Stripes were first unfurled, and so populous and great have the states become, that it seems almost an eternity of time since Betsy Ross sat in her humble home and made the flag. And yet there are today or at least were recently living in Philadelphia descendants of Betsy Ross who heard the story from her own lips.

Collieries in Lancashire, England, are still on short time, most of them not running more than four and a half to five days a week.

She Was Surprised.

"You must be a good girl," said the nurse to little 4-year-old Flossie, "or you will go to the bad place when you die."

"An' where will 'ou go?" queried Flossie.

"To heaven, I hope," was the reply.

"My goodness," exclaimed the little miss in surprise. "Do Dod hire nurse girls, too?"
